I don't want to be stuck with the current crop of websites if someone with a better idea comes along. By forcing companies to pay for get-out-of-the-slow-lane access, you're handicapping every web designer who doesn't work for Facebook.

—Jason Flindall, ,

i have been planning to start creating internet content.

—Jesse Rabidoux, ,

I shouldn't have to write this. It shouldn't be the case that people who have no idea how a field works get to make the laws for that field. It should be obvious to anyone who wants to make the laws for this that Net Neutrality is a must. Not a want, not a nice-to-have. A must. Lack of net neutrality is tantamount to giving up the idea that small businesses have a right to live. It is one of the harshest imaginable blows to democracy today, and democracy needs all the help it can get. Classifying ISPs as Title II Common Carriers is a step in the right direction. It is a step toward democracy, toward more freedom for regular people.

Why does FCC want to marginalize North America? Internet perceives obstructions as damage and routes around it, so if slow lane is introduced in the US, all creativity will move elsewhere.

I make my living on the net (I have a disability which makes holding a regular job difficult/impossible). The economy is still terrible for the average person. Please don't make it worse for people like me, and there are a lot of us (who work online). Thank you

Giant corporations such as Comcast, Verizon and AT&T have been allowed, through their strong lobbying, to create monopolies and have systematically demanded that the public pay exorbitant amounts for their services. Doing away with Net Neutrality will only enable these giants to destroy competition and dictate content and speeds available to the public.

—Susan Perkins, ,

Let everyone share information. Do not let corporations buy their way in to delaying the information for profit. The consumers already suffer because we can only have carrier provider, whom laid down the fiber cables for the internet. allow equal opportunity.

—Diana Ruiz, San Diego, CA

The internet was shaped by us the people and we should be able to access it freely and inexpensively without regulation by the FCC who are they to tell us whats right and wrong.

—Bob Mitchell, ,

As a musician and artist, it offers untold access to supporters. As a resident of San Diego county, recently hit with a day or two of nine separate fires in my region, it was invaluable to get news and immediate updates online using social media outlets. As just one person living on this side of 1995 or so, just one among hundreds of millions, I have stopped or minimized the use of brick and mortar services or USPS where online equivalents suffice (bank, utility payments, some shopping, replacing those horribly bulky things called phone books, etc.). Undoing or degrading the ability to use the current online infrastructure to do such things would be a rather dumb thing and would make a lot of things move far slower and clumsier since the various brick and mortar/in-person/print means have suffered declines. There would be plenty of trouble trying to revert back to that if the net neutrality was let to be choked.

Freedom means free to be private. One should be confident that one is not being spied on. This is the BIG BROTHER country.

—John Lloyd, London,

At the current time, I am using my computer to search for JOBS! Slowing websites that cannot afford to pay the "toll" fees required by big telecom and cable companies could severely restrict my searches for a position. I would be very disappointed to see the 1% given control to shut me out of the economy and would definitely stress that my Local, State, and Federal Official investigate all ties that all members of the FCC have to Big Telecom, Cable Enterprises, and all others that carry Internet Service.

—Henry Narve Jr, Thousand Oaks, CA

Net Neutrality gives everyone the chance to launch a successful product not just the large corporations

—Patricia Claytor, Saint Louis, MO

Communications is a basic human right; Big Business that is interested solely in "the buck" rather than community building communication, which is what the internet is about, has no place in the dialogue or regulation.

—Caroline Maloney, ,

As an aspiring independent content producer, a fair and equal internet is the only way to ensure my voice is given equal weight against those with the deep pockets to throw us small guys in the "slow lane" It's not just an assault on the internet, it's an attack on small business, and free expression.

—Devin Pruchnicki, Auburn, GA

The internet was built to its present success as a utility using the principle of net neutrality. The major ISPs would now gouge the public while playing fast and loose by redefining their business in mid-stride. The FCC has a responsibility to protect all the citizens of the country, not just these profiteers.

—Glenn M. Mooney, North Smithfield, RI

Net Neutrality is the key for free speech.

—Jose M. Latas Latas, Pontevedra,

It is the only level communication playing field left. It is not some cash cow for the already rich. Any decision to create fast/slow lanes on the internet will prove disastrous. Classification as a common carrier is the only logical and moral step. Anything less is unacceptable.

—William T Suellau, Georgetown, CA

The internet provides a level playing field for individuals, businesses (large or small) to access products, services, and information to better their lives or knowledge of the world around them. Removing or tampering with net neutrality will see the larger businesses or other powerful enterprises take control of the internet and slowly push out those that cannot afford to pay or play. It will stifle innovation and provide a potentially negative impact on economies as small businesses and start ups have difficulty affording access and visibility.

—Mark Palmer, ,

Dear FCC: As a small business owner, I need access to broadband that is fast, without interference from BIG CABLE. Please reclassify broadband to be like a utility--available to all without Big Corporations having monopoly of what I do and see on the Internet. Net Neutrality is part of democracy, innovation for all. Best regards, Janet Archer Chief Executive R & J Archer Petroleum LLC 6153 N. Mattox Road Kansas City, MO 65141

A free and open internet is the single greatest technology of our time, stimulating ISP competition, preventing unfair pricing practices, promoting the spread of ideas, as well as driving entrepreneurship and most importantly protection of freedom of speech control. None of these should not be at the mercy of corporations.

Just look at the case of Netflix, whose speed on Comcast was increasingly declining until they paid up, their speed MAGICALLY went back up. That's blatant sabotage and extortion. Source: <http://knowmore.washingtonpost.com/2014/04/25/this-hilarious-graph-of-netflix-speeds-shows-the-importance-of-net-neutrality/> No fast lane. No slow lane. Just one, neutral connection for all. I fear that if the US sets a precedent for allowing ISPs to damage the internet in order to further line their pockets, Canadian telcos will follow.

A level playing field fosters innovation - preferential treatment for those who've already 'made it' in business will lead to the people at the top becoming lazy(ier) and those at the bottom not seeing a point in trying.

—Kyle Murphy, , the internet has become the main pathway for all communication. once our main communication channel becomes structured and controlled as to how the communication takes place, it will eventually become unfeasible and will need to be replaced. the world will lose a beautiful simple mechanism to communicate so someone can watch movies. that should be a big problem to everybody.

Stop giving Big Business what it wants just because they pay you for it.

—Eric Jacobs, Boise, ID

Content providers are the heart of the internet. A neutral internet is critical for existing and new sites / services to exist.

—Sean Healy, ,

The government lied to us about how deregulating cable would allow us to pick and choose what we wanted to see. I think we can be pretty sure that commercializing the internet will be even more of a handout to providers and less good for ordinary people. The so-called invisible hand of the marketplace is, instead, the all too visible hand of government policies that favor a quick buck for those who already have plenty while The Rest of Us get the crumbs. The providers won't be offering better service or more service; they'll be redistributing the service to those who will pay more. That's not the marketplace of supply and demand but the manipulation of the marketplace to create scarcity where none existed. We, as private citizens, are seeing our postal service put out for sale to the highest bidder, and print media are disappearing. Everything from applying for a job to registering for classes is done on the internet. It must be declared a common carrier if we are to avoid cementing the place of those who have less into a permanent, underserved underclass.

—Jim Fails, Fremont, OH

Net Neutrality is important to me because the internet, and internet freedom are not a product to be modified for the commercial benefit of big telecom.

—Jim Varga, ,

This proposal goes against all aspects of equality forcing less well off families into a second rate service with long term impact on education, work and improving their futures. Why should the already dis-advantaged lose yet another resource to increase already inflated profits for greedy shareholders.

This reclassification of broadband providers only serves big telecom, and results once again in exploitation of the common person. Make the pro-democracy choice, and keep the internet accessible and efficient for us all!

—Robin Suprun, ,

The costs for internet service are already out of control.

—Julie Hacker, Kirkland, WA

The ability to openly express and share ideas is the number one value the internet provides to everyone globally and universally. To impede this in any way silences the voices of those who could otherwise not be heard. Technological advances whether sanctioned or not have found a way to maintain freedom on the internet. And if not the Internet, then the next Internet, or what some like to call the Outernet or Undernet. Don't waste people's tax money and peoples time by instituting abhorrent laws. The people will ultimately speak and establish what they want.

—Bashar Abdullah, ,

If the privates want to control the Internet, fine. SELL it to them; the government started it, sell it and the price is three trillion smackers. Too much? OK then, it's a public utility. Solved.

—Mr. Charles Benedict, merced, CA

—Martyn Cleroux, ,

I don't want the internet to be dominated by only the rich, big companies. I want to support and protect creativity and freedom.

—Margaret Joppa, ,

Net Neutrality is a good thing since it provides equal treatment and access to the internet, keeping it a free and open place for all. The internet has revolutionized free speech and the power of public opinion because it has not been divided into tiers and throttled. Net Neutrality is good for competition and thus good for innovation! Without rules protecting Net Neutrality, a content company like Netflix will be able (and required) to pay more to deliver their shows to consumers. Smaller content companies, particularly those offering free video content, will have to wait in line behind Netflix to stream. No matter how good the content is, consumers won't sit around for many 'buffering' pauses. If the content companies have to pay more, the price will trickle down to the consumer! Amazon and Netflix will have to pay more to produce and deliver their content, which means they will have to charge more. That cost will trickle down to the consumer in the form of higher subscription fees. The market effect won't balance the costs either, because companies trying to compete with cheaper offers won't be able to stream at the same high speed. ISPs are trying to 'Double Dip'! ISPs argue that they should be incentivized to invest in infrastructure that results in a faster internet. This argument ignores that they are already charging consumers for their infrastructure and are now trying to 'double dip' by charging content providers too. To make matters worse, ISPs effectively have a monopoly in most markets – inhabitants in large cities have just a few cable/internet options and small markets often have one.

I view the internet as a new land, and currently everyone is rushing in to claim some of it because of the opportunity there. If we allow large companies to "buy up" all the land, people will notice that it is now less free, and will be less inclined to make use of it. Mark my words, if you give companies the right to exploit bandwidth restrictions, people will suffer, and freedom will suffer. Do the right thing please.

The main stream media is controlled by monied interests, and cannot be trusted to tell the truth. We need the internet in order to find out what is really happening in the world. —Greg Wallen, Utica, NY

It works the way it should right now.

—Robert Keener, ,

The internet should not be able to be bought, like so many other things in this country - keep it free, available to everyone and regulate it like a utility, not enable corporations to take control and ownership of it. You should recall that the internet was actually developed by the US government and it should be owned by the people, not big business...

—Elliott Sernel, Palm Springs, CA

Broadband providers should not have the right to block or control any content on the Internet. It must remain a politically free medium for the greater benefit of all.

I already pay over $70 per month for internet service as a rural customer. How much more would this policy cost me?? Very concerning developments for those of us outside of urban centres. Net neutrality is fair for everyone.

—Andrea Aldridge, ,

An open and equitable internet is critical to developing technologies that will improve our lives and our environment. The proposed changes threaten to undermine the very things that make the Internet work.

—Lorne Laliberte, ,

Its already known that big telecom throttle our internet to prevent us from fully using the service we pay. Now we have to pay more for a fast track lane? This is absurd. Telecom SHOULD NOT have ANY POWER over BLOCKING CONTENT period. It is the same as PROPAGANDA similar to what CHINA uses.

—Colin Fcong, ,

The whole strength of the internet has come from the levelling effect of net neutrality; it's what allows new businesses and ideas to start at low cost and flourish when they meet needs. Providing ISPs with a route to charge either businesses or individuals for equal delivery quality will stifle innovation and degrade the usefulness of the internet. Please reclassify ISPs as common carriers, so the internet can continue to be the force for change in the coming decades, as it has in the last two.

I stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

The Internet has become the worldwide platform it has because of the open availability of bandwidth and non-discrimination of content. While that does create millions of blogs of cat pictures, it does provide the baseline for companies like Facebook, Google, etc. Creating a 'two-lane' Internet, where the well-heeled can get preferential access, defeats that purpose. It will strangle the startup mentality that has been the model of Internet commerce for the last twenty years, where all you need is a good idea and UNENCUMBERED bandwidth. I urge you to bite the bullet, represent the voting public and not the providers you're supposed to be overseeing, and set common-carriage rules on Internet providers, with arms-length rules about content providing divisions of those ISPs, such as Comcast/Universal.
—Robert Halloran, Jacksonville, FL

Freedom of communication is hugely beneficial to every single human being. Hoarding and monopolizing the ways in which people communicate online will ultimately cause economic shortfalls in ways that the big Telecoms don't appear to comprehend. I'm sick and tired of living under the RULE of a government that consistently puts corporate interests over the interests of WE THE PEOPLE. Governments role is to lead not rule and corporations should NEVER come before people... PERIOD. You end net neutrality and I give up... comcast can come take the cable off my house. I lived first half of my life without the internet, I can finish my life without it. My only way to fight your pet corporations id non-participation. You can't force me to do business with them so I wont. If people stop using the internet or step down to the slowest, cheapest connections, you will kill it. Corporations are NOT America's friends,. They RAPE America and put little back! They have killed the middle class with greed and I don't know where the hell they think their customers come from. The internet is a utility! The FCC and corporations have killed television.... Comcast owns it ALL and they put no effort or money back into it Nothing on tv but repeats! Now you want to let them screw everybody and even other corporations! Guess there's not much left but for them to feed on each other and then what?

—Harold Anderson, seattle, WA

To give regulation to the greedy telecommunications industry is an abomination and an insult to the physicists who invented it. Verizon, Comcast, et.al. have done nothing to warrant the gift of big money and control of what speed each citizen and company receives by how much they pay is anti-American and against every thing for which this country stands. Tom Wheeler should recuse himself from this decision making process since he owes the telecommunication industry his allegiance because he worked for them for so long. This government has made so many terrible decisions which have cost us our place in the world. Please do not make this one. Leave the Internet alone and free, and tell the telecommunications industry to "go fish".

The FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers."

—Elaine Waldron, London,

Equal Internet for all! No slow lanes!

—Ryan Austin, ,

Allowing big telecom to create a "slow lane" will be yet another instance in North American culture where second class citizens will be created due to the almighty dollar. Big telecom will increase their fees until only the top 1% can afford to remain in the "fast lane". This will allow nothing more than an increase in big telecom's profit margins as they will no longer need to worry about having enough technology in their infrastructure to give the vast majority of the population first rate service. Additionally, this will lead to even the top 1% of people that can afford the new exorbitant fees being unable to access their first rate service country wide as big telecom will argue that the density of people requiring the first rate service does not support the cost of the required infrastructure in lowly populated areas.

—Shane Kelemen, ,

This is the best way to be able to see rare film footage, see unreleased classic music performances & to be able to get DVD's & rare albums from other countries. If it goes away, one cannot be able to get rare artistic collectables or see these performances again.

—Michael A. Johnston, San Diego, CA

I believe net neutrality is essential for the growth and innovation of the internet. This has led to the rapid growth we all experience. Letting large communications conglomerates create a fast lane for those who can pay and a slow lane for those who cannot will certainly stifle this innovation. It's obvious these large conglomerates can't be trusted in the public interest when they are among the lowest customer approval ratings in any industry. This is just a way to charge popular websites like Netflix more to insure their customers are on the fast lane at the expense of smaller sites. It would also allow these conglomerates to favor their content over competitors. We all pay for access to the Internet, whether you are a end user or a content provider. ISP's should be treated as "common carriers" like telephone networks and regulated as such. The exchange of information and ideas should be equal to all. Please do not allow a two tiered Internet.

—Ron Cox, ,

We all benefit from the Internet.

—Marjorie Slack, La Fayette, GA

I do not want big business ruining the Internet.

—Mr. Frank Clouser, Eureka Springs, AR

Net Neutrality is the communications 'air' that we breath and it should be available to all on the same terms.

—Jack Thomas, ,

Protect the individuals' rights vs big corporations' wants.

—Jana Kelly, Royal Oak, MI

Because I believe that the internet should be free for anyone to use.

—Johnny Preston Hill, Gadsden, AL

I think it would be wise to keep an even playing field when it comes internet speeds, or larger businesses with greater influence will squash competition with smaller potentially innovative companies. Will likely lead to monopoly's that will adversely affect consumers.

—Erik Gronfeldt, ,

I think the corporations have taken quite enough of our lives and livelihoods

—John G, Goldendale, WA

Net neutrality keeps us from being exploited

—Clay Morgan, ,

The internet is a vibrant economic engine

—Jay, ,

Our country is much more than corporations--it's individual PEOPLE, who all have the right to access this most important method of communication equally, regardless of their ability to pay a premium for faster, better, or less restrictive service.

—Belle Sprague, Chino Hills, CA

Net neutrality = privacy = freedom

—Jerome Zaavy, ,

Internet should be a public utility

—Kathryn Plitt, Gig Harbor, WA

Net Neutrality keeps big business from exhorting other businesses and allows small businesses to compete in a global economy, also without it customers will be denied the internet speeds they have paid for and be rerouted from the sites they want to go to and sent to other sites.

—Mark Suazo, Cleveland, TN

Broadband providers should be classified as common carriers. It's just common sense. I don't want them deciding which websites should get special treatment. All should be treated equally.

—Lincoln Wright, Mesa, AZ

Please reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers." Do not create a two tier system; to do so would be to say "All are created equal, but some are more equal than others."

—Joseph Singer, Larned, KS

The poor people should not have to pay excessive amounts of money just because the wealthy people can afford any amount that is asked. The middle class is struggling now just to live.

—John Thoma, Dayton, OH

Net Neutrality is the ONLY FAIR way forward.

—Dylan Toigo, ,

Net neutrality is important because it allows people to be opened to each others... as much as being polite or arrogant..kind or aggressive...it is all part of freedom of expression.. if we were to give security parameters control over to a firm or organisation which goes by it's own rules... then we would end up in a 21st century book burning... information awareness... the reason most Ceo of high ranking organisations are all out on information control is all about a DEEP rooted fear of death! why? people who fear death, are ready to do anything to not die... the projection of thoughts to the idea of being all knowing and all powerful is not even a goal of pure higher beings...It is simply the goal of Fearful beings. When a person or organisation that has a lot of power on their hand it is important that those be made aware, that WE the people and the citizens are not just those that make them rich... we are your environment, If you disrespect it and treat it like trash...You will reduce your quality of life..on other hands. give it love and it will give you so much more...instead of Fearing death...Try loving life!

—Samuel Babin-Gill, ,

No one should be in control of us and our use of the Internet !!!

—Linda Roe, ,

We need choice and lower costs not a move toward The net's being controlled by and for just a few big players.

—George Postgate, Truckee, CA

If we don't have a free and open internet, we don't have a free and active voice.

—Aaron Minchau, ,

I am an entrepreneur, programmer, and designer. I will be at a severe disadvantage economically if true Net Neutrality is not in place. I want the internet to remain free and open, I do not want someone else to have the ability to decide what content I can view and when or how I can view it

—Peter Rennolds, Wilmette, IL

The Internet functions as a common-carrier service, as vital as telephone access, in our modern world. It should be classified as such.

—Mary Donch, New Rochelle, NY

The higher costs and limited speed will all but guarantee that fewer individuals can have their voice heard in an open forum. The range of issues and diversity of voices will be dramatically narrowed. Your favorite indie media producers or innovative service will be stifled, and the big producers will be the only game in town. Genuine and authentic choice online will slowly die. Small businesses, innovative services, and free expression will all become collateral damage in Big Telecom's war on the open Internet.

—Joe Christ, Sugar Land, TX

The internet has changed the very fabric of the country. To alter it's current form to one that favors some over others would be pandemonium. The economic boom the United States has enjoyed over the past 20 years has come directly from a neutral internet. Please preserve this critically important platform by reclassifying it under Title 2 as a common carrier.

—Alex Martin, Verona, PA

Democracy depends on it!

—Guido Filippo Serio, ,

Net neutrality allows small startups to compete with internet giants. An internet slow lane would squash competition before it has a chance to compete. The next Google or Facebook could be killed off before it's even starts!

—Greg McMullen, ,

It is the very openness of the internet that made it what it is today. To change this would be to hand it over to "vested interests" - the telecom giants and big business. That way lies suffocation.

—Brendan Dunn, ,

Big telecom can't stand competition....been gouging people for years , net neutrality allows choice without compulsion !

Bedridden, disabled; the internet is my world..

—Honora-Bright Aere, Blodgett, OR

Internet prices are already outrageously high. I refuse to pay more to access certain websites. I would resort to using only public internet and refuse to pad anyone's pocket with more cash.

—Jennifer Gibb, ,

For all the listed reasons and all the ones I can't think of. I'd write you an essay but I refuse to believe you don't already know the impact.

—Grayson King, ,

Because the Internet must be free and equal for everybody.

—Aurele Dufour, ,

I want access to all information available, not just only the often misleading information my ISP wants me to have to misinform people to shape this country to its benefit.

—Brian Burwell, Momence, IL

The people own the internet. It is tax payer supported. Broadband providers have no more priority than anyone else.

—Richard staley, Los Osos, CA

The Internet is in fact a public utility that is essential to everyone in America. It must be regulated as such. Allowing corporations control over the Internet is insane. The Internet must remain neutral and equal for all users.

—Ron A McCullough, Nashville, TN

I'm already paying $75.00 for the highest residential broadband speed available in Las Vegas, NV. I cannot afford to pay more, I am age 65 and my only income is Social Security! Internet is vital to me for information, online banking, paying bills, shopping, communication, etc. because I am disabled and cannot drive everywhere for these vital services. These greedy mega-corporations want to own and control the internet so they can censor and extort more money from consumers and websites.

—Ms. Susan Savarise, Las Vegas, NV

Consumerism is poison. Selfish people are always on the lookout to find ways to put money into their own pockets at the expense of others. We must stand strong and protect what has always been and should always remain FREE and OPEN to all who wish to access it. For all of us who know better, we must stop bowing down to selfish and ignorant people who want to attach a dollar to every single product and service that human beings want or need. Where do we draw the line? In addition, should this ridiculous proposition continue to move forward, you can be sure those who have spoken out will create ways around this insanity.

—Briana Boldin, ,

I'm against this slow lane proposal. Why should the greatest country in the world offer slower internet speeds to its middle class.

—Ricardo Torres, Miami, FL

Net neutrality is important for a free society, economic growth, and a democratic economy.

—William B Molony, New Orleans, LA

I want to be able to continue to access decent information, not just "selected programming".

—Bill Northcott, ,

Bring fair play back to the table.

—Bruce Mackay, ,

Telecoms shouldn't have the right to limit the flow of information. They only provide the internet because of antiquated bullshit laws that only stand because of absolute greed on their end. Their ability to lobby with large sums of money (which we pay to them for service) to governing bodies to make these laws is absolutely vile. They didn't make the internet, we did and it's about time we took it back and made it free

—Brandon Thivierge, ,

Freedom from oppression by corporate fascists.

—Mahmood Atif Shan Mian, ,

Telecom companies seek to impose a tiered service model in order to control the pipeline and thereby remove competition, create artificial scarcity, and oblige subscribers to buy their otherwise uncompetitive services. I believe net neutrality to be primarily important as a preservation of current American and of course freedoms for all people. Vinton Cerf, co-inventor of the Internet Protocol and considered a "father of the Internet," as well as Tim Berners-Lee, creator of the Web, and many others have spoken out in favor of net neutrality. This may at this time seem unimportant now to some but will someday, as we move further towards our future and our children's future, govern the very foundations of free commerce, both as providers and consumers, educators and students seeking the truth unobstructed, and all those who understand that freedom is our God-given right. Please don't allow the few to control the many!

—Mark Nohner, Sun City, CA

Information and equality for all.

—Thierry Laurion, ,

Is freedom really freedom if it is being controlled or monitored by corporate agenda? I don't think so

—Jeschi Quillao, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me because I am one of many voters and taxpayers that has helped pay for the Internet's creation and deployment, and therefore absolutely no one person or organization or any other entity should have power or monetary rule over the people's electronic messaging domain.

—Jeff Cody, Reston, VA

We need freedom
—Michael Katz, streamwood, IL

I use the internet. Everyone does. It's become essential for business, entertainment, life, etc. The so called fast lane is the open door to all kinds of new ways to limit the internet, a goal of some parties for a long time. Now is the time to protect our right to communication, and free flow of information. Keep the net neutral.

—Callista Mansell, Greensboro, NC

My life is better for the Internet. Don't let the corporations price me out of the game and back to isolation.
—Lloyd W Loring, South Bend, IN

Because if the US destroys net neutrality, the rest of the world is likely to follow...to all of our detriment.
—Sean Mitra, ,

History has proven that open access and neutrality are the best ways to stimulate markets. To have big money and profit seeking corporations restrict access is not in the best interest of our citizens and democracy.
—William Chavez, Sacramento, CA

The net should be open to all at a good speed not just those who can pay the big bucks. I already pay comcast twice, first to have internet and then the blast service so it will run at a reasonable speed. This is robbery. These big companies don't own the internet didn't build it . Everyone needs access especially those with less money!!
—Debra Arbuckle, Alameda, CA

Internet access must remain on an all-equal basis. Individual rights do not, and should not, depend on who has the most money.
—Richard Weil, Waialua, HI

Because the internet doesn't belong to anybody, and limiting access to those without enough money is immoral.

Net neutrality is important for all users, do not allow the greedy corporations to take over the Net and ruin the system for all of us.

—Donald Ross, Raleigh, NC

Freedom of expressions and free rights

—Derek, ,

Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Patrick Danser, Martinez, GA

Please keep the net neutrality, many entrepreneur people depend on it to keep up their business, blogs, web pages. Do not create another obstacle on internet for us.

—David Flores, Los Angeles, CA

All content should be freely available

—Chris cole, ,

In a political system owned by the very wealthy and ruled by corporations cleverly disguised as people, a free internet is the only tool left to the middle class to make its voice heard. We do not want that voice filtered through AT&T, Verizon and other giant telecoms whose deceit is matched only by their greed. They have enough money and enough power without owning the internet too.

The net is an essential utility for free speech and expression for the public to access.

—Mauricio Duque, Fort Worth, TX

The internet must be kept free from control by the few - whether corporations whose only business is to make as much money as they can, even if that means preventing those who are not wealthy and powerful from having equal access; and governments, which try to control access to information to support their own control of whole nations.

—Joel Horner, ,

The FCC is going down the same road as other countries by trying to control the use of the Internet and in doing so it amounts to a form of censorship, this is the same thing that the FCC and others condemn other countries such as China, and Korea. This is censorship through the back door.

—Martin Walsh, ,

Adding access restrictions to the internet kind of defeats the whole purpose of the thing... It's adding stop lights to a superhighway, and only allowing you to drive on it if your car is expensive enough.

My time is just as important as big business' time is. They don't deserve special treatment so they can increase their profits at the little guy's expense. Please protect us!

—Sheri Hewitt, Creswell, OR

Net Neutrality offers a level playing field, promotes communication, innovation, without fear of being "guided" by whatever a monopoly thinks is best. Personally, I would rather see prices go up across the internet spectrum than to have a corporation dictate what, where, and how I traverse the internet.

—Harry Hayes, River Falls, WI

Unhindered exchange of knowledge is essential for progress and allowing providers to charge more for an essential service that is virtually uncontrollable by the consumer is cruel and barbaric. There are greater problems within our nations and any step against Net Neutrality will only further impede our ability to resolve them.

—David Galavan, ,

I'm sick of these corporate pigs running this country for their benefit alone. Is there anyone with the guts and integrity to stand up to them, or are they all bought and paid FOR?

—Gill Fahrenwald, Olympia, WA

Net neutrality is vital for to stay a free and equal society.

—Georgette Baumgartner, San Jose, CA

The growth of the Internet has been due to its users. US, the ordinary people of the world. It could be said that WE OWN the Internet. Not those who would rule over us, or the commercial Interests which are trying to introduce draconian laws to prevent our use of it, while they enjoy Carte Blanche use of the 'Net to advance their own interests. If charges are to be levied on Internet users shouldn't the commercial users be the first target? After all they are the ones who are using OUR Internet most to their own pecuniary advantage. The Breach of copyrights is a concern. In years gone by sales of copyrighted material included in the purchase price a charge that included the copyright fees. Advertisers using the Internet do so because of its ease to advertise their wares. Shouldn't they be told they do so at their OWN risk? They use the Internet to advertise their wares because it takes away the need to ship their goods around the world to millions of retail outlets, as they use to. This interference with the freedom of the Internet, simply panders to the insatiable greed of advertisers. The short, simple answer is to PROHIBIT all forms of Commercial Advertising from Our Internet, and let those interests revert to their earlier arrangements of promoting their sales. i.e. Via normal retail outlets. Peter Grove.

The internet still has the potential to be a great leveller between populations around the world. Please don't compromise that potential.

—Yvonne Howard, ,

I am against the consolidation of the Media...it goes against the future of our democracy and gives the people with the most money to determine what we see and do on he internet. Mr. Wheeler, did you ever hear of Thomas Paine...if he could see what you are trying to do, he would roll in his 200 year old and counting grave.

—Carla Behrens, Longmont, CO

The internet is supposed to be an area for free expression and as the ultimate information repository. Allowing large corporations to use their money to put their business in an advantageous position is wrong and stifles competition from smaller companies/startups. The internet must be treated differently than corporations in the free market would want, it is too important to humanity. Think of how it would be if the police system worked the same way. People with more money would pay the Police more, and they would be protected while the people with less would receive little/no protection. Some things are too important to leave to the free market, and I believe the internet is one such thing, a necessity for life today and in the future.

—Dan Prantl, Alpharetta, GA

We don't want to be forced into paying the high rates of the big carriers just so we can have reasonable speed. I can censor myself, I don't need the government doing it.

—Dwight Cummings, ,

Affordable access to communications is vital to a democracy.

—Mr. Greg Frost, Portland, OR

—Joe Murison, ,

We are growing our economy in a finite system; this cannot last. When the crash comes, we will need to adapt our lifestyle to far fewer available resources. Easy communication will be a critical asset. Just as Big Business is crippling our political system and its function, so will these proposed changes act long term to cripple our personal communication. It's a chance we cannot afford to take.

—Donald White, Rexford, NY

The internet isn't an American toll road, everyone has a right to access whatever websites they want.

—Maggie, ,

The Internet grew from the idea of sharing information freely and now it has grown to be a pillar that holds up modern society, we are growing and expanding at an immense rate allow anyone to have free use of this incredible creation, to entertain ourselves and also educate ourselves. From one simple Google search one could look up anything they could imagine and find information about it. 50 years ago that would have been near impossible. We hold all of mankind's information on the Internet for anyone to make use of to better ourselves, and you want to add paid prioritisation to that. Slowing down access to the less fortunate and wealthy to monopolise the free Internet that has grown from voluntary contributions from millions of people around the world. That is shameful and wrong. The Internet was created free and should stay free.

—Joel Quick, ,

We need to hear both sides of all issues, especially political, not just what one side wants us to hear.

—George Heupel, Ashland, KY

The internet has been has been one source of equality for everyone that all of us have been able to use without various companies being able to push people around as they do in so many other cases. Please keep it that way.

Since the FCC seems reluctant to protect consumers from Wheeler's old bosses, we found some people who will. I'm an online college student who lives in a rural area and my ISP is already choking down the bandwidth they sold me and I pay for; I shudder to think how much worse it will get once Wheeler gives the go-ahead to their take-over of this publicly-developed Commons.

We have the Right to free flowing information. You have the Responsibility to protect our Rights. Enough is Enough.

—Michele Brophy, King Ferry, NY

It would slow down most of what I use the internet for in the 1st place. Takeing that right away from the American People & giving the "carriers" the right to slow down those who can afford to pay is nothing but WRONG! I pay for my service just like anyone else does, but making me pay more to be able to continue doing what I can currently do while others pay less yet get slower service or none at all is unethical at it's best. Classify all internet providers as a public utility now!

—Kathryn Penrod, Round Rock, TX

An advancement of civilization that benefits all of mankind regardless of financial status requires an open and untethered internet. The only filter for information should be the individual's own mind, not corporate greed.

No one...not even the "Big Telecom Companies" OWN the internet and should NOT be looking at trying to change that...Net Neutrality is of the utmost importance to not only myself but everyone in every province & country in the world. It is important that it remain "Net Neutrality" FCC absolutely must reclassify internet service providers as "common carriers"

—Nelda Ward, ,

I pay enough for the Internet. I don't want to further enrich the GREEDY telecoms.

—John Hope, ,

In Real Estate as the saying goes LOCATION,. LOCATION, LOCATION on the internet as the saying goes BANDWIDTH, BANDWIDTH, BANDWIDTH. The proposal before the FCC (an independent organization) and Mr. Tom Wheeler are considering a two tier system High Speed Bandwidth for corporations like Verizon, Comcast, AT&T, and Time Warner these companies could exclude companies like Netflix and Hulu on their channels offered. However like most companies if these companies merge with each other we will eventually have a Legal Monopoly like AT&T was many years ago. AT&T was broken up into seven Baby Bells. Verizon had a lawsuit that brought about this proposal. Mr. Tom Wheeler (a former lobbyist) of course is wanting this proposal to go through. I believe the Internet should remain the same as it is today. The proposal gives too much power to the big telecoms they could limit content, or outright deny smaller companies access to their channels. This is against America's Freedom ideas.

It is a fallacy that BIG IS BETTER. Look at corruption in Banks [institutions of Trust ???] and corporations [millions of faulty cars recalled . . . after efforts to hide evidence] leads to the conclusion that Big is not Better. Rather Big is BADDER and one wonders who has been 'paid off' among civil servants, so called.

Non-common carriage and pay-to-play designs operate to bleed the republic.

—Vincent J. Patti, Long Beach, CA

The internet is and has been for all; not sectioned off so that only the wealthy and certain "corporations" have full, unfettered access to all the information and entertainment therein. It belongs to all of us, and should remain at least as free (monetarily, content, and accessibility) as it has always been.

—William Eddy, Ashland, KY

Stop corporations from cheating and spying on us. Internet monopolies are pretty common, or internet and phone companies split up areas which eliminates competition. .

—Susan Gibson, Jackson, MI

I have a right to access the information that I want at the same speed as anything else without me or the publisher paying more

—Karell Ste-Marie, ,

No person or party should ever have that much control over information. The internet is a resource, and should be open for all to do with it as they like with it, without restrictions or fear of outside influences making alterations. The collective human experience is not an algorithm from which business models can be based on. Stop collecting our information. It will not do you any good.

—Xavier Granville, ,

Because big buisness should not be allowed to throttle internet speeds on certain web pages because they want more profit. I should have the same access to all content at the speeds that I pay for. If I am paying for a 20 mbps connection I want to have that 20 MBPS with all of the content I access. If I am getting less than that from the provider because another company is not paying them extra to be preferred. I should not be getting penalized.

—Frank Duguay, ,

As an internet professional for almost 20 years I advise you that broadband providers must be reclassified as common carriers. That is what they are after all. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Anything else will be unworkable and counter-productive.

—Paul Codd, Beverly Hills, CA

Don't kill the open net

—Mike Trivich, Sylmar, CA

The internet is becoming the primary medium of communication across this planet. Crippling that medium for those users and businesses that can't afford to pay extra will reduce the quality of the internet for everyone, serving only the interests of the few large incumbents.

—Andrew Heins, ,

With technology the way it is today the average American can't do daily business without the internet. I have to kids, one in high school the other in college. I can't imagine what it would be like if we didn't have net neutrality. Please don't turn this into another capitalistic scam.

Net Neutrality affords all users open, equal and low cost access to the Internet. Corporate telecoms will do their best to limit access, speed and content in order to increase their profits at the expense of the general public. Reclassify broadband as a common carrier and put an end to this social, economic, political, corporate exploitation!!

—Harry Heim, Novato, CA

We already have cable tv. We do not need to turn the internet into a new version of cable tv. Tiering service will let the wealthy take control as they will outbid everyone else for bandwidth. The internet as we know it will die. The people will not benefit.

—Juan Ernesto Magaña San Juan, ,

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

The first amendment, is the first for a reason, freedom of information freedom of expression is the cornerstone of freedom. Without it, humanity - democracy is lost. We are lost I am Lost, you are lost. If you doubt it, ask the leaders of communist Russia , the same despots who gave a little for corruptions sake met the same fate as those who gave a lot, everyday we have to make choices, choices that may seem to challenge us, urging us to compromise our values our ethics to our immediate self interests, but in the long run, the wages of sin is death, the wages of compromising who we are in small ways have vast impacts, and will destroy. Our own particular lives are meant to be lived as reflections of our greatness as a people and as a world - if you won't stand up for us, who will? if you won't protect us from Monopolization, from commercial tyranny who will? May your actions on the vote day reflect the bravery from imperfect people who have risked all, who have given up life thier liberties and thier persuance of happiness to protect ours. Now in this momentous decision even if it seems minute, you have the ability to stave off oligarchy and the inevitable tyranny that follows, for you and your children. To say to despots and conglomerates with an aim at controlling and undermining in premise even if not in practice, that for which is the life blood of every human life, freedom of thought expression and life, your fight is now and the first battle is tomorrow , decide if you will side with tyranny oppression and injustice for immediate gains or if you will side with freedom justice and a chance for hope, for us and our future. The choice is yours the war is our daily decisions in life.

—Tiffany patel, San Diego, CA

These days everyone and everything is on the internet, including higher education. I would like to finish my degree and I can see that being seriously hindered by the effort to slow-lane certain functions and sites. A slower internet would harm smaller business and free enterprise, two aspects of commercialism that the wonderful United States of America was built on. Why turn your back on that history and go backwards with technology? The USA has always led the way, continue to be a leader into the future. Vote No for Internet Slow Lanes.

As an educator I have seen what the brutality of have's and have not's produce, this plan of creating a tiered internet with corporations to look after our well being instead of a regulatory agency is BAD, BAD policy. Please show the American People that pay your salary that you stand with the principals of a democratic civilization and not with the corporate oligarchy, classify broadband providers as common carriers.

Anything less than this is UN-american and an insult to those who have served this country in any capacity. Most sincerely Brien Durham

I work on the internet and do not want to see it destroyed like cable has destroyed television.

—R H., Scottsdale, AZ

As humans interface with digital technology it is understandable why corporate investors want greater control. This next phase of our history/biology will be crucial to the evolution of our global society, as well as it's economy. I believe that the survival of our species has relied much more on cooperation than any other quality, so I believe and scientific research can prove that maintaining what is already cooperative and working very well is worth protecting in it's present state.

—Michael Maclean, ,

I am a senior living on a fixed income and would no longer be able to afford the internet if the fees are raised. This will be true for other seniors, as well as low income families. With everything being geared towards the Internet these days, it is unfair and unrealistic to raise prices. This will also have the effect of lowering profits for providers with fewer people being able to afford to have the Internet.

—Mary-Lou Bradley, ,

The FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers." Internet is part of our life styles and is used for learning, entertainment, and keeping in touch with family far away. It should not be taken away from us or slowed down.

—Agnes Garbowska, ,

So there maybe equality among users who use the internet. Also here in our beloved Canada people are already over paying for Internet usage and although there has so called been a deregulation, the Big Telcom companies which control the internet backbone are still taking advantage of users by having the over pay for these services, this must come to an end.

—Kirk Cox, ,

I'm old enough to remember life before the internet --and to appreciate the innumerable ways, large and small, that the creation of the world wide web has made life easier, richer, and more connected. But all these benefits to ordinary citizens are only possible because of Net Neutrality. If the internet were under the control of a few corporations or for sale to the highest bidder, its benefits would accrue mainly to those who already hold most of the money and power. I don't throw this word around lightly, but allowing Big Telecom to rule the internet would be flat-out undemocratic. Reclassify internet service providers as common carriers. The internet IS a virtual public commons, and We the People want to keep it that way.

—Karen Newman, San Luis Obispo, CA

It is important to keep the internet as low cost as possible. Many people, including myself, cannot afford to pay a higher price to acces the internet. Please don't make it one more thing that only the rich can have.

—, Nacogdoches, TX

Net neutrality is important to everyone who uses it, including all the members on the FCC. Why on Earth is this even a consideration? We already pay for different packages from our ISPs that not only collaborate so there's only one provider in each area to choose from (which already limits our choices when they provide terrible Customer Service), but gives them the right to potentially police us even more? We, the people, already have to deal with power hungry, strong armed corporations that do whatever they want since they have power in real life, we DON'T need that on the one freedom we all enjoy. The internet is a necessity for people nowadays and it's perfectly fine the way it is.

Not creating a double tiered system is central to the ongoing democratic reality of the Internet. While a degree of classism exists simply in the disparity between those with internet access, and those without, at least there are not so many tiers between websites and those who utilize the internet. Corporations and large private organizations already have a corrupting imbalance of power in most of society - let us at least keep the internet a place of greater equity and parity.

Common carriage fosters a free market and democratizes power, distributing it from a tiny, trust-like oligarchy of ISPs to everybody else. Short of busting the trust, Net Neutrality is the best policy.

The internet should stay free and open an un censored. You are not elected officials to censor the internet creating a a slow lane for those that can't afford the high priced internet that's fats. Keep your dirty hands of my un censored internet

—Samuel D Stahl, ,

Net Neutrality is an absolute requirement for ensuring a functioning democracy. Allowing commercial interests to filter or slow access to information is no different than what dictatorships do, just under a different guise. Commercial interests controlling information access is no different than political interests doing so. In many ways, in fact, it is worse: financial interests can manipulate politics even more than ever before.

—Ron Garcia, Fort Lauderdale, FL

An open net leads to new technologies and discoveries shutting it down only hampers new discoveries.

—Mark Antrim, Menomonee Falls, WI

Implementing internet slowlanes would be similar to gangs charging protection money to operate a business in a certain area. The potential for extortion, and the ruining of the internet, are too great to allow big telecom to have the power to charge websites, what will likely be exorbitant fees, to have their content disseminated to internet users.

—Abakasanga N. Etang, ,

This is my 7th comment to the FCC. I am adamantly opposed to any compromise to net neutrality. It will have a huge adverse impact on my small business, but more importantly it threatens the freedom of the greatest modern tool humanity has at its disposal - the open and fair dissemination of content and information.

—Colin, ,

I am sick and tired of "companies" getting the best of everything! They did not create the internet and it should remain EQUAL to individuals and companies alike. —Sean McGinley, ,

Freedom of Speech

—Betty Geddes, ,

This topic (Net Neutrality) is of exceptional importance, especially in areas like ours. I (like many Americans) have extremely limited options (in fact, only one) for High-speed broadband internet and telephone/voice providers. Besides the ugliness of someone else telling us what we can or cannot do or access online, allowing providers to classify content and block or slow access to that content would give our lone ISP absolute power to control what we can or can't see, use, and consume on the internet. This is EXCEPTIONALLY HAZARDOUS to internet freedom and freedom in general given that much of our daily lives are transacted or spent online. In fact, this very message is being accessed and sent over the web - who is to say that an ISP wouldn't be interested in slowing it down or blocking it? The airwaves in the United States have always been a public trust. Telephone carriers are required to allow subscribing American families telephone access over their lines (if for nothing else, for emergency services such as 911). Our telecommunications systems have since morphed into an almost exclusive VOIP system carried using protocols like IEEE 802.3 ethernet, DOCSIS, and TCP/IP and are all modulated & demodulated to be carried by our ISPs - we don't have any other choice. For this reason, bills and notions such as this MUST be dispelled - they would pave the way for VOIP phone calls to be blocked to certain people or exchanges (perhaps extreme, but possible), allow an ISP (many of which are also cable television providers closely tied to certain TV networks and have contracts with certain programming companies/channels) to strategically slow down, disrupt, or block service to other TV networks or programming providers, or to do the same to advance their own social, marketing, or political interests. Absolute power corrupts absolutely, and allowing this to take place would be wrong in every way. Thank you for your time and for reading.

—Chris Campbell, Attleboro, MA

This is very important to me, not only for myself, but for my children's future use of the internet that we have all enjoyed. The "big" ISP companies must not be allowed to have full market control of the internet.

I'm on the net daily, so I don't want any radical changes that would deny my access without paying additional money.

—Ed Orr, Oklahoma City, OK

As a person with a disability, who is essentially homebound, I depend on my connection to the internet to communicate and maintain contact with the outside world as well as other basic functions such as banking and entertainment. I have a very limited income and my bill for telecommunications, including internet, telephony, and television service is already my third highest monthly expense after housing and food. I believe that if the current system of net neutrality is not maintained, it will inevitably lead to higher fees for access to services that I use daily. They will eventually become unaffordable and this will lead to a further widening of the digital divide so that high speed internet access will become the exclusive privilege of the wealthy. That will have profound consequences for our educational system and our democracy. Thus, I believe universal access and net neutrality should be protected from corporate interests whose primary motivations is increased profit.

Once again, the "big boys" are trying to rig the game, but this isn't the usual banal commercial game. The Internet is the modern Free Press. It was built with taxpayers dollars and shouldn't become the cash cow of a few who will distort it beyond recognition and away from public and democratic purposes. Don't let them get away with it. Make them common carriers.

It is my everyday lifeline for everything. I use sites that are often free to use and that I think will be lost in this plan for a slow lane and fast lane.

—Nickie Bell, Nampa, ID

I'll repeat again and again, handing over the internet to the highest bidder hurts our future as a nation. The poorest of us who add the most cultural capital will not be able to afford research or communication. An open internet that is not for sale can only benefit the teachers, scientists, students, and artists who use it.

—Hillary Juster, Dallas, TX

There are countless reasons why Net Neutrality is important. Basically it comes down to the same concept as monopolies. The internet needs to be open and non discriminatory of data in order to maintain an even playing field. Also, Comcast + Time Warner is a terrible idea. I have little faith that this message will be heard by anyone :(

—Michael Dimattia, Encino, CA

Net Neutrality is a key component of free speech in our changing world. Without access to the same internet as the rich, marginalized people see their voices get even smaller, and freedom begins to disappear.

I have a number of relatives within the US. We chat back and forth. This is just a giant money grab and hurts individuals but makes smaller competitive businesses less viable. The little guys can grow while BIG TELECOM have less and less opportunity than to utterly crush the little guys who employ locals who also pay taxes. BIG TELECOM have a lot more resources to avoid taxes and get subsidies from government. LEAVE THE OPEN AND FREE INTERNET ALONE. It was paid for by the people from research to development and used by the military before who eventually opened it to the public.

From its inception the internet has been a free, open and valuable resource for all. Allowing cable and telecom companies to charge higher rates for faster access and to slow connections for those who do not pay will subvert the core value of the internet and lead to a slippery slope culminating in a divide between the "haves" and "have nots." Since the internet providers are well compensated by their customers, adding further tolls for a "fast lane" is not only counter-productive, but also nothing more than a grab for more money. It is not in the best interests of the public, not now, nor in the future.

I run a small business with an ecommerce website. I can not afford to compete with against large corporations who can afford the higher barrier to entry an artificial "fast lane" will impose on me. The playing field needs to be level and this requires an internet that is neutral in regards to traffic. In fact, the internet should be a public utility. Please stand with small business owners and keep the internet truly neutral so we can compete fairly.

—Dave Lozier, Scandinavia, WI

I support efforts to maintain a truly open Internet. I believe that FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler's proposal threatens it. The proposal would change the Internet—even though the Internet is not broken. To quote the FCC's 2005 Policy Statement, throughout the Internet's history, access to the Internet has been granted "in a neutral manner." ISPs did not block sites; they did not engage in "technical discrimination," treating traffic from some sites or applications better than others based on the class of the application; and they did not offer "paid prioritization"—fast lanes for those willing to pay extra. Up until this year, the FCC guaranteed these aspects of neutrality in policy. The Chairman's proposal would change that. Though it would forbid blocking, it would permit technical discrimination and paid prioritization. It would also permit ISPs to negotiate exclusive deals with websites and app-makers in certain sectors, offering them and only them access to the fast lane, while relegating all of their competition to the slow lane. Finally, it has loopholes permitting access fees and discrimination through interconnection and mobile access. The Chairman's proposal would force owners of websites and applications to negotiate individual deals with cable and phone companies across the U.S.. The terms of the deals: sites or app-makers pay ISPs to make sure their users—who are already paying those cable and phone companies for capacity to access the Internet—can use their site or application without being buffered to death. That's unfair to the users and the entrepreneurs who have made the Internet the place it is today. The Chairman's proposal also creates perverse incentives. It's a road map for cable and phone companies to disinvest from their networks, to create congested slow lanes harming their users and most websites and applications just to extract some extra money from the few large companies who can pay to avoid the congestion. Allowing this to happen in the US sets a dangerous precedent for net neutrality to be destroyed in Canada as well. Sincerely,

Yvonne Gettins

Again & again to put a stress on the fact, that internet carriers must be bound to guarantee equal service to anybody as this basic to a real free because democratic medium for communication and obtainability. There's no vision in "special level-services" for premiums and "the dirty rest" - it'd only cause bad obstruction and cyber-criminality - cause nobody will tolerate being excluded from what should be understood as a basic: remember that "freedom of communication" is a major part of the UN-Charta of Human Rights!

The common carriage reclassification of internet providers assumes that the common people can continue to fully participate in innovation and a shared public forum. The internet has provided the means for rapid idea sharing and problem solving unlike that in the history of mankind. We do not need another divide between rich and poor. When will our government actually care about the common good? Instead of the self interest of corporations?

—Meredith Blatt, Columbus, OH

A lack of net neutrality would re-shape the Internet landscape into a place where large businesses could oust smaller competitors, not based on quality of product, customer service or level of innovation but through sheer financial strength, completely undermining the Internet's greatest positive: the tendency to reward innovation and quality with success.

—Daniel Ferguson, ,

I feel there should be more competition engendered in the internet service marketplace because service providers are too complacent, too expensive and there are too few options currently available for the public. —Daniel Scott, ,

Corporations already own and control our government. There's no need to give them ownership and control of the Internet. Personally, I feel that the Internet should be classified as a utility and protection for consumers a priority of government.

—Charles B. Mullen, Canton, OH

ISP's competition does not require slow/fast lanes. Reference success in competition in other countries where there are more players and speeds are better for less cost to the consumer. Our government is to protect our people, and our corporations exist solely to serve the people, not to be free themselves.

—David Hecht, Uniontown, PA

Growing up in a rural community I had 1 choice for an internet provider - terrible. Adding slow lanes to the internet will significantly hurt rural communities who have little or no choice for their internet provider - who already gouge these markets because there is no competition. The way to foster a better internet is to regulate it to ensure a minimum and affordable viable service for all, not to have a premium service for those with the deepest pockets.

—Sara Wolfgang, Rancho Cordova, CA

Net Neutrality what the Internet was founded upon; a system that self-regulates, routes around damage, and is highly flexible in terms of connectivity. If we want to continue to see innovation without being stifled or unduly influenced by big carriers, they need to be forced into accepting that they must accommodate all traffic equally.

Net Neutrality keeps the Internet a potent an essential source of information as well as an outlet for thoughts and opinions that are vital to a nation which calls itself a democracy. If the Internet is restricted to only those who can pay, death to democracy most certainly lurks in the future of America. I love my Internet the way it is and was meant to be, not a creature to be manipulated by non-human, inhumane Corporations. Down with Citizens' United!

—Jennifer Humiston, Huntsville, AL

As I learned in 1975, the purpose of an "Internet" was for the exchange of ideas and information. Is that not what a Federal Agency is supposed to do?

The internet has grown into an amazing culture thanks to the previous stance the FCC took. Net Neutrality fosters growth of untold proportions in every aspect of the economy. Not only that but this stance has fostered social changes, finally bringing back some TRUE democracy back to the citizens. Please do the right thing and maintain this stance instead of simply forcing web hosts to give the internet companies more money. This is nothing more than a money grab and provides no benefit to internet businesses or users. Simply wrong.

I am stuck with Comcast as my provider due to my location. I can barely afford my just adequate internet now. Do Not Do This to Americans. Your job is to protect us not give corporations whatever they want.

—Cheryl Biale, Olympia, WA

The internet is a ubiquitous and fundamental communication platform necessary for individuals, government, and businesses (large multinationals and small, locally owned). Access to this worldwide utility cannot and should not be limited based on fee structures or political leverage. Please protect everyone's access to the internet by NOT allowing telecom companies to create slower and faster communications lanes. Thank you.

—L Cam Taylor, Portland, OR

As a writer, musician, perpetual autodidact and researcher, use of the open internet has become possibly the most important tool in my intellectual life. Access to websites of medical, educational, bibliographic, musical and literary content are essential to living a full, potentially successful, life. As a displaced-worker older American who lives on less and less income, the open internet offers information and access to an immense variety of experiences, access to otherwise financially prohibitive information and allows social access tools I might otherwise not have available. Most of the websites I utilize are small, many non-for-profit, and many sites personal and individual. Most likely none of these websites would be able to pay special access fees to broadband providers. For the extant history of the internet, it has operated essentially as a public utility, with free and open access to all, if you can afford to pay the broadband provider fee. Please do not lead us down the road to a kind of privacy of access that will most likely lead to a few companies controlling our access to information, and possibly lengthy and costly anti-trust suits. I urge you to finally solve this debate and strengthen our democracy, by reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers under Title II. Thank you for your attention to this critical matter.

—Robert Meyer, Seattle, WA

Many think that access to the internet is a right. Maybe it is. If it is then Net Neutrality is extremely important and it is up to our governments to protect this right as they protect all other rights. If it isn't a right, then government has to balance what Big Telecom wants with what the people expect and have been led to expect. Here in rural Canada, we know all about slow lanes. If you are going to allow this then I strongly suggest that you do one or all of the following: tax 100% of the profits, break up Big Telecom into smaller units to create more competition or create an alternate net.

Net neutrality is important as means of open access to information and freedom of expression and speech. It was created as open communication for all. Taking this away and forcing people into a two tiered system will only result in increased commercials and a growing gap between rich and average. This will create a lot of discontent and anger for a lot of people!! Innovation and investment will suffer with a two tiered system. So will small businesses, community projects, volunteer and social services and a whole host of grassroots organizations. Dont be the ones to halt the base line economy! As a developer and person who is on the computer every day, I have watched as the internet has changed lives and opened the world up to complete equality of the distribution of thought, influence and creative expression. To eliminate net neutrality is nothing short of oppression driven by greed. It is wrong in every sense of logical thought.

—Angelia Baladon, San Diego, CA

ISP's are only the last link in a world-wide infrastructure to foster commerce, education, and the progress of our society. It is ridiculous to allow ISP's to artificially filter our access to the internet so they can extort more money from their customers and from websites around the world. It is even more ridiculous when you consider that many ISP's have been granted local monopolies, eliminating most people's ability to switch ISP's and crippling the free market. If the FCC goes ahead with its plan of allowing "internet slow-lanes", then it is neglecting its duty to the American people.

—Eli Ren, Seattle, WA

Stop trying to control everything! Having an open and free internet is what made this country. We founded this country on the basis we were free to do and believe what we wanted. Stop trying to take us back to England!

A free and open internet is the air that our pretend democracy must have to breathe. It is no surprise that our predatory cartel capitalist model and their lobbyists seek to kill it. Please use your last ounce of integrity to resist the bribes, extortion and gilded revolving door.

—Ron and Marya, Medina, WA

Internet is the last vestige of humanity, and an endangered species as we all are. Exploitation is the name of the game and here you have the opportunity to raise the flag and say no to the exploiters. The Internet is a life line for the human being and must be protected at all cost, NO TO EXPLOITATION WHO ARE DETERMINED TO CONTROL ALL OF US FOR THEIR GREED. This is not the battle field for a power trip between tribal warriors at our expense. We need to continue on the path as it has been and to protect this human path, not take or allow it to be taken from us.

—Jonathan Backstrom, Cambridge, MA

It seems impossible to call the FCC's proposal for a "slow lane for net neutrality" anything but disingenuous.

—Jacob Lahne, Burlington, VT

Internet should be treated as a utility, like water or electricity, where no person or people get preferred service or access. Allowing big telecommunication companies to pay for privileged performance is like giving the rich permission to drive faster in the highway, just because they have the money to pay for it.

—Thomas R. Brewer Jr., Flagstaff, AZ

Why would you monetize the last true freedom in existence? Shame on you for taking corporate money and pushing their agenda. You represent THE PEOPLE! Remember that...

—Ivan Shumaker, San Francisco, CA

I am a teacher. I want free and open access to the Internet for myself and my students. Internet searches have replaced the traditional library searches of the past. It's hard enough to get access to reliable information as it is. Educators and students should have open access to all research tools, and we shouldn't be slowed down or encumbered by fees from Big Telecom companies to gain access to what should be open and available to all in the first place. The Internet belongs to everyone. The FCC needs to keep it that way.

—Nancy Murphy, Maryville, IL

I dont want slowing down and blocking of websites by big telecom, I want real net neutrality.

—Tim Sandor, ,

For these reason! Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Daniel Humeniuk, ,

Because the Internet is where people can find jobs or make phone bill payments and anything else. But if they add a fast lane there are supporting a dictatorship like Venezuela or Cuba where the Internet is censor at all times!

—Alfredo Hernandez, Los Angeles, CA

The openness of the internet is an enormously important thing in this computer dominated society in which we live. The internet creates the closest thing to a level playing field that the average person has with a larger company. If Big Telecom is allowed to choose what parts of the internet their subscribers have access to, this freedom and equality will no longer exist. Please stand up for what is right here and do not allow Big Telecom to segregate our internet so that they can make more money. Giving the average person a pathway to succeed is the American way. The idea is that if a person works hard enough, they can achieve their dreams. An internet without free access could, and most likely would, keep people from being able to compete in the online marketplace if their subscribers are not rich. This is not the American ideal. Please back the people and do the right thing. Thank you.

—Daniel Davis, Mesquite, TX

I am a programmer working on federal contracts from my home office. I depend on unfettered access to do my job.

—Robert Kaiser, Whitefish, MT

The internet is my lifeline - please do not cut me off. I am retired and on a fixed income.

—Allison Cox, Vashon, WA

I believe that everyone should have equal access to the Internet. By creating a slow lane, you give large corporations and those with deep pockets control of information and financial transactions that hinder growth and innovation. Creating an internet of "have and have-nots" does not help anyone but those corporations who only want to serve their own interests.

Big money controls everything, but they better keep their dirty hand off my internet!

—Arvin Blakeney, Centennial, CO

Net Neutrality is important in order to foster competition for online services. Already we have seen providers move to compete with services like Netflix. Already the incumbent providers have an advantage because they can offer bandwidth capacity free usage where other services count against monthly usage limits. By allowing for these so called slow lanes the providers can relegate competition to slower channels or force them to pay additional fees for access to high speed channels. Clearly such a policy puts the incumbent in a position of extreme power because they can dictate charging premiums for all services which they don't own in order to extract more money from consumers or block competition.

—Daryl Hellewell, ,

Net Neutrality is the thing that makes internet the place it is. Many things wouldn't come to pass if it weren't for full access people around the world have to this universal tool. Think not only of your money when you're doing this, but also of what will be thought, told and most importantly done, if this idea becomes alive. One thing is certain, history teaches us, that people can be trampled only this much Broadband has become a vital public utility. Please protect Net Neutrality so that we can maintain and strengthen American democracy. Thank you.

—Nickolas Pittman, Oak Park, MI

Net Neutrality is important because it prevents my ISP from doing evil things like slow down websites like Netflix for me, then charge me to make it back to normal. They could also make VPNs slower or even block them. Removing net neutrality would not be in the best interest of the people. It would be in the interest of the ISPs because it would allow them to make more money while the consumer is hurt. Removing net neutrality would tell the people that the US government cares more for the large corporations than for the people.

—Arya Azartash, San Marcos, CA

The internet belongs to no individual group, and should not be controlled or regulated in such a way.

—Hd, ,

Net neutrality is important to me because it allows me to explore a wide range of information freely without needing to worry about my access or speed being slowed down due to a particular site not being liked and/or approved by the FCC. Please keep the net neutral and free.

—Joshua Araki-Kwee, Hilo, HI

The internet presents news and ideas regardless of if they are profitable or not, whereas media is tinted by what sort of story sells and if something might harm the network or advertisers it is unlikely to be published. Allowing telecom companies to prioritize bandwidth is tantamount to censorship.

—Daniel Guerriero, Nanuet, NY

"Premium access" favors big money corporations. Big money corporations already get too much preferential treatment. It would be not fair to the rest of us. I favor Net Neutrality as a fairness issue.

—Daniel P. Giesy, Norfolk, VA

Most of us are not part of the rich and powerful interests.

—Lareta Finger, Harrisonburg, VA

The true beauty of the internet is that it allows all people access to information. It has the potential to create the best educated generation that the world has ever known. With restrictions through the imposition of a slow-lane, and even higher fees, those with fewer means would lose yet another point of access to new ideas, and potential education! Keep the internet open and interesting for EVERYONE!

—Emily Dymock, ,

It is against the constitution and I am fed up with everything that is being done to destroy our constitution. I believe that the internet should remain and open internet, so we the people have a chance to hear the truth about what is going on in this country not what big business and big companies want us to hear, not what the government thinks we should hear.

—Donna Lauzon, Romulus, MI

Net Speed-For-Pay is tantamount to censorship, which will kill the net's utility as a place of exploration and free thought leading to innovation.

Open and available Internet freedom, access and transmission for all websites and users of those site. This freedom is a human right and needs NO big Corp or Gov intervention, regulation or control.

—Barry Troy, ,

As you may already know, this move makes the other 98% of us less able to communicate, speak out publicly,.....It's a bad idea, right in line w/the Supreme Courts rulings to muzzle the middle class by flooding the internet with corporate money....

—Ann Carlisle, Colorado Springs, CO

The control of the internet will completely take a the freedom humanity is barely clinging to. Access to all information is the only way the citizens of the world will be able to lift themselves and evolve into a whole united society free from war and poverty, and unite us into a peaceful transition to the human race we can and will become. These decisions should ALWAYS be people over profits, if not, the people making the wrong decisions can be replace.... either democratically... or forcibly. Make the right choice now or eventually your legacy will be seen in the books of history as atrocity's... right up there with evil men like Hitler and Stalin. This is OUR choice... so choose wisely!

—Darrin Weed, ,

The internet has grown because of its accessibility and openness. Allowing large companies to control how well it works and charge a premium to control access to higher speeds is unfair and undemocratic. The current system is not an impediment to business (Google would be a good example of this...) and the proposed changes would impact those least able to defend their rights and afford the change. Do not change this, leave the internet neutral. Regards, Bob Waddell, P.Eng.

The internet is arguably the greatest tool for free universal expression in human history. The ability to self express, self publish and explore new information has increased literacy and expanded the potential of the many over the few. Creating access to information for the rich and a slow lane for the poor is creating a greater class divide for access to information. Not only is it unfair it's unethical.

It was government money that did the research and development to create the internet. The return on this investment should belong to the tax payers and not to large corporations. In today's world this "utility" we cal the internet is nearly as vital as gas and electricity and is deserving of being provided by common carriers.
—Ravin Carlson, San Clemente, CA

It will amount to extra fees for content providers who cannot pay for Fast Lane privileges. These fees will be passed along to the consumer.

Because the UK hasn't even prioritised getting a standard speed across the country. BT for years now has owned the majority of telephone lines across the UK, yet they refuse to help anyone who has to put up with their poor, pathetic and absolute ludicrous quality in at least 75% of the UK. Adding a fast lane, would only make things worse, by making the minority have to pay to get their well deserved speed and the majority to suffer even more when the only bandwidth available is sold off to the wealthy.

—Thomas Lister, ,

Net neutrality is a principle that has allowed things like the Arab Spring to even occur. I understand companies desire to make every $ they can, but at what cost to civilized society ? Please ensure that the Internet is a level playing field for everyone.

—Alan Wagner, ,

Really? Why is this not abundantly clear to FCC regulators? Allowing corporations to stratify the speed of access depending on the ability to pay will gradually diminish an individual citizen's ability to a useful resource. What could be more understandable. Preserve Net Neutrality.

—Deane Bristow, Newport, OR

We in America are already misinformed to a large extent by near- monopolistic corporate media outlets such as FOXCRAP. YOU should not allow money to destroy our country with extreme propaganda and falsehoods, as dished out by oligarchs and plutocrats such as Murdoch. For this reason, net neutrality is very important. Rule in favor of the common man/woman, as opposed to sucking up to corporate America.

—Robert Obeid, Bakersville, NC

Free expression is a principle of our Constitution and Bill of Rights.

—Dr. A Cannara, Menlo Park, CA

Elon Musk of Tesla can see that sharing information is what helps us innovate. Innovation means progress, and a stringer country. Many years ago, our stories and findings were collective property. Not only have corporations (like Disney) stolen our public property (like all the fairy tales, not one of which they wrote), not some people think we should sell of the mean by which we share our ideas. Our society is so divided between rich and poor, selling off our communication channels is not just morally wrong but it will further the divide between us, and slow down innovation, ergo progress. AS we see corporations insinuating themselves in our daily lives, we also fear that allowing corporations to decide which sites are faster or slower will lead to censorship, and further moulding of society by the few in power. This is not where any of jus want to go. I would like to meet the person who currently owns all of this, because if it is not owned now, it belongs to the nation, the people of the world, and right now, we all refuse to sell out. If it is ours, not yours, I am pretty sure you can't sell it anyway.

The Internet has become the communications channel used by many, many people. To limit or charge for access is unfair to the people. Internet access should not be a right for those who can afford to pay. It should be available to anyone and everyone.

—Yolan Mistele, Arbor Vitae, WI

Net neutrality or the loss thereof is the best example of the fallacy of the Supreme Court's decision that free speech equates to money. With net neutrality everybody has equal access to free speech. Imposing financial burdens to internet use will again make free speech expensive and non-affordable to the general public. This should make it clear that we need net neutrality

—Rudolf Scharte, Columbus, OH

it is my lifeline to the world

—Julie Laidlaw, Friday Harbor, WA

Freedom of speech is a basic Human right. Taking away the ability to have unadulterated speeds and access for fair prices is criminal. The fact that so many people pirate anything can and never will be prevented. If most of the readily available media we're and always were great, without so much as any terrible re-iterations previous ideas and concepts, then I would understand charging people and stopping them. But the fact of the matter is that most of the AAA or big company titles, for lack of a better term, complete trite. I urge you to focus more on the products and services already being provided, and see them as accordingly set in price. The end user is already charged with overage fees to due with bandwidth as it is. With the amount of users and how it is already set up is almost criminal, considering digital media costs little or nothing to maintain vs. the gross revenue.

—Sean O'Donnell, ,

Taking away net neutrality and allowing for anything else will take away competition and innovation from the internet. Allowing this to go through will only let people and organizations with money hold a monopoly on the traffic and create an unjust balance. I urge you to keep net neutrality.

—William Sawtell, Gig Harbor, WA

Internet neutrality represents one of the last bastions of real democracy. We live in a world governed by power, greed and excessive profit taking in the energy sector, pharmaceuticals, banking, creative stock trading and other industries. This kind of imbalance must not be allowed to permeate the internet. Innovation and improvement of the human condition can never flourish in darkness.

—Tony Hoft, Kelowna,

The telecom companies did not build the internet and have no right to try to restrict access. They are already paid for access.

—Derek Chatfield, ,

Freedom, innovation and competition can only happen with net neutrality.

—Douglas Gould, ,

Net Neutrality is of the utmost importance. The internet and the freedom of how you access it is too important to let corporations decide how it should run, how much to charge and most importantly who has access. These are greedy people that want more money and more power.

We've to say no and stop bending over backwards to suit their needs vs the needs of the public.

—Geramy Goudie, ,

Keep the free flow of information barrier free.

—Damian Velez, Parlin, NJ

Do your jobs and stop bowing to money.

—Wally Furr, terre haute, IN Commercial use is only one of many uses for the internet. I hope you will keep this in mind when you decide.

—Greg Jemsek, Ashland, OR

I don't want big telecom companies even more power than they already have, it will allow them to censor views they disagree with and no one can counter them because they have almost monopoly power from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. They will use it for their own agenda, block rival website or negative review of their service or product or any bad practice from them, fcc should rather do what's good of the country. In order for internet to be different from cable, it needs FREE SPEECH and freedom of expression and with the ability to slow down or block websites it infringes on free speech, and equal opportunity. Also it reduces and even squashes competition and an OPEN Internet.

—Rash, ,

The internet should be free and open to all, and not controlled by telecom companies. Content availability should not be regulated by who is willing to pay more.

—Terry Sanders, New York, NY

NO corporations have the right to fuck with free information. Everyone in the world should enjoy the SAME internet. The powers that be fear the internet because it empowers the spread of knowledge freely.

—Curtis, ,

Net neutrality is important to everyone, restricting access by increasing costs penalizes those who are too busy making ends meet to be able to spend more on internet access. In this time in history internet access is a necessity, from school work, part time jobs at home, or applying for jobs, and don't forget those with disabilities for whom the internet has changed their lives, deaf friend communicating without a TTY, or a relay operator. This technology has changed the world and belongs in the hands of the many, not a privileged few!

The FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as common carriers!!

—Manuel Di Franco, ,

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Matt Enos, ,

I believe that internet should be as free of interference by government and business as possible.

—Don Wood, ,

Net Neutrality is the defining factor that makes the internet such a marvelous place for learning, collaborating, and creating connections around the world. The greed of certain companies in the private sector should not be appeased. The internet needs to remain open and free to everyone!

—Zachary Zulch, Laguna Niguel, CA

I want neutrality. i don't want priority relative to cash

—Alexandre Michaud, ,

The net,as is works for everyone, leave it alone

—M James Arnett, Westlake Village, CA

Telecom companies shouldn't be able to decide whose communications are important. The internet is the modern equivalent of the airwaves and should be subject to common carrier rules.

—, East Brunswick, NJ

Big, dark money in politics squelches the voice of the people. Net Neutrality helps level the playing field. Don't create a Slow Lane on the Internet for those lacking money and power.

—Jeannine Powers, Denver, CO

Internet access is vital to almost all businesses. This access should be equally available to all, like interstate highways. Small businesses and startups can't afford to pay big premiums for internet access, like giant corporations can. An economic blow against these smaller businesses would be a needless blow against the middle class. The middle classes stabilize society. Isn't it obvious that destroying the internet is bad public policy?

—Robert Blankenship, Fairfield, IA

This is a free and equal rights nation. Don't destroy our freedom.

—Carl Heerwagen, Spokane, WA

The internet should be free and available in equal terms to everybody.

—Vitor Torres, Woking,

Net neutrality is essential for open communication between people, and between people and businesses. Many small online stores will NOT be able to afford the higher priced speeds if these proposed regulations go through, and their business will suffer.. and since small business is over 75% of what make my province's income, to have free and open internet without throttling with customers and suppliers is needed.

—Karen Gilmore, ,

Internet access has become essential to the way we work and play. We must do everything we can to ensure it remains a level playing field for any and all comers. The FCCs domain may be in America however so much of what happens on the American internet affects us overseas. Reclassification is the only effective tool available to prevent the telecommunications companies abusing the monopolies they have on the last mile.

—Simon Smithson, ,

I cannot afford to pay additional fees, etc. for things I currently receive for free.

—Stefan C Taylor, Tampa, FL

Because freedom and equality matter, regardless of how deep your pockets are.

—Andres San Martin, ,

I helped build the Internet. I didn't do it for corporations to destroy it.

—Wayne E. Nail, McDonough, GA

Without net neutrality, our very opinions, and our ability to work in a world that is now so based on the internet for buying, selling, work, communicating with our families, etc; would be under the control of people and organizations who care NOTHING for the above, only to extract money from us. Imagine an emergency, a crucial part in someone's life, or a small company's life. A good analogy would be taking the sirens away from ambulances, and making them go by the same traffic rules as everyone else on the road. The patient, would die.

—Keith Schneider, Coos Bay, OR

Everybody equal rights!

—Daan, ,

Without freedom of information there is no freedom.

—Gerald Houska, ,

The internet has worked perfectly without intervention of big government and stupid overbearing regulations. To allow for the internet to be turned over to big telecom who will charge big fees for premium service will keep many from being able to use the internet. Phone companies already over charge for what should be free!

—Donald L Wieser, Louisville, CO

Stay out of MY internet!!!

—Annaliese, Tallahassee, FL

It's CRUCIAL as it is for EVERYBODY ELSE!!!!

—Roxana Hanson, Los Angeles, CA

Everyone should have equal rights, not just rich people.

—Barbara J. McVein, Vista, CA

Because without neutrality, companies can make deals with providers to force their competition out of business. As consumers, we deserve a competitive market and choices. As business owners, we deserve to not be forced out of business by monopolies.

—Tatham Johnson, ,

Net neutrality permits millions of small users, such as myself, to access the internet on an equal service-quality basis with the commercial giants.

—Carl Cooper, Holmdel, NJ

Isn't it obvious?

—Dave Gahary, Neptune, NJ

I urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality. Thank You

—Christina Bouajila, Albuquerque, NM

The open Internet has been one of the most democratizing forces in the history and humanity. As inventors (and often stewards) of the Internet, the USA has a responsibility to keep the Internet open. Allowing any kind of Fast Lane or any method of preferring content due to money is against the nature of the Internet and the United States.

—Eldridge Alexander, San Jose, CA

The internet has worked fine from the day it was conceived and operated by the government and university research facilities, and should not be controlled by private companies.

—Mark Choi, Pittsburgh, PA

Maintain a force for democracy, not corporatism.

—Peter Bollington, Branscomb, CA

Net neutrality is an essential ingredient for the dissemination of information to all people in the world regardless of their social or financial status in society.

—Dennis Balgemann, North Fort Myers, FL

Net Neutrality is important to me because when I or my children want to start up their own business and use internet to increase traffic and market themselves it's not fair that those who know the right people get the high advantage.

—Daniel, Sammamish, WA

The internet is a vital tool for all people and should be treated as a public utility as is water and electricity. I understand that companies who supply the internet should be compensated for erecting and maintain their equipment but to that end and not much more.

—Calahan Miller, Encinitas, CA

The Internet should be a public utility not another tool for corporations to loot the public!

—William Eckert, Paso Robles, CA

Dude, I am not suger-coating it, get us net neutrolity that protacts users from corprete abuse, not further encourages it.

—Erik, west new york, NJ

Anything other than net neutraltiy will destroy the internet as we know it and limit future growth. This will negatively impact our economy.

—Phillip Randall, Woodland Hills, CA

Allowing a few powerful interests to control the internet flies in the face of democracy on multiple levels not the least of which is continuing to allow free peoples the freedom of expression they currently enjoy. The failure of the FCC to reclassify broadband carrier would be yet another blow to individual rights in favour of multinational corporations. I urge you not to allow this to continue!

—Patrick McGuinness, ,

If you want a strong economy, you need people to thrive. People cannot thrive if everything is made harder for the future innovators.

—Micheal Pacitto, ,

Internet access let alone DEPNDABLE internet access is too expensive as it IS...it's time for YOU to serve the PUBLIC INTEREST and NOT the interest of the telecom industry...NO "SLOW LANES" for them to make even more money as they continue to deliver sub-par service at expensive rates.

—Chris Sherrill Cain, High Point, NC

Because we need to be able to access the web and allowing big companies to have advantages in any way over the internet will cause a monopoly that we don't need.

—Jennifer Cagle, Bartlesville, OK

Net Neutrality represents freedom to all persons that reside in a democratic state.

—Victor Cyr, ,

Charging more for what is currently available or forcing people to pay more for what is already available due to arbitrary reasons is ludicrous. No material change or upgrade has been offered or made available to even warrant such a thing as an internet fast or slow lane.

—Mudasar Ahmad, ,

i stay connected to the world.

Freedom on and of the Internet is integral. Harassment, defamation, libel are not. I stand with Open Media on their request to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers.

—Earleen Dover, ,

True net neutrality = fairness

This the last avenue for true freedom. Do not restrict or limit this freedom to those with deep pockets and place everyone else in 2nd class status.

It's like roads: they'll bring you anywhere where you want without interference from anyone, to go out and meet friends or explore. The difference is that this one is just digital.

—Sjon Welters, Cabot, VT

I'm sad to hear that despite everything you're still trying to censor the internet as this is a complete lack of democracy. I am a professional illustrator and most of my work comes from the internet with the TPP the way I make a living could change for ever; there are families that depend of the non-censored use of internet and you're taking away the means for them to make a living. What you want to do will affect deeply our society and our free speech. Our governments have been always proud of being called "democratic" and "free", but this is an abuse of power and an abuse to people. Please think on what you're doing, think on how this will affect and change the lives of millions of people in, regrettly, a negative way. I ask of you to please put your hands in your hearts and think this through not with ambition, but with love. Thank You.

—Carolina Arriagada, ,

Net Neutrality is important as it assures that everyone has equally audible voice in the Internet. The open Internet is a medium of wonderful freedom of speech and thought - we must not let anyone spoil it.

—Marta Kornas, ,

The internet is not broken. It doesn't need "fixing!"

—Shane Hicks-Lee, Blossburg, PA

The people who created the internet and the web did not do it to make money; they saw it a part of our 'Global Commons'. Look it up if you do not understand that concept!

—Patrick Kinnersly, ,

Big business should not have the power to destroy net neutrality.

—Darlene Jakusz, Amherst Jct., WI

This was something for people to be able to use for information and entertainment, not for corp. to make millions! Just say leave it alone!

—Todd Clifford, ,

Net neutrality helps prevent escalating economic inequality and helps to realize human rights for all.

—Maggie Zraly, Logan, UT

The internet is not an optional extra in our lives, it is an essential service and it needs to be available to all of us, regardless of our individual wealth or where we live at a reasonable cost. Of course speed will be important since most of our communication around the world will be accomplished over the internet. I do wish that you would consider this matter seriously and find in favor of those who are unaware of this question even being considered or are unable to offer you their opinion. Thank You

—Catherine Churchill, ,

It is the last democratic thing left in America. The rest of our country, including the Supreme Court, has been sold to the highest bidder.

I don't visit only big mainstream websites, as a consequence I don't want the websites that can't afford the new fees to be slow down.

—Amaury K, ,

I'm entitled to the same privileges as you are and should NOT be charged outrageous fees for less, throttled usage and privacy invasion. Actions speak louder than words. Don't just SAY you support the open Internet - SHOW US!

—Amy, ,

Open communication (freedom of speech) must continue to be one of our democratic rights!

—Allan Hansen, ,

Cause fuck FCC

—Marcus, ,

Net Neutrality preserves open access to the wealth of information provided by the internet. Today, we as Americans are free to share our opinions and, more importantly, free to receive the opinions and information of thousands of millions of our fellow internet denizens. While I respect the corporations rights to request payment for access and payment for speedy access, to allow them to create their own fast lanes toward preferred content would create artificial dams in this new environment, penning us up from the ready access to the wealth of human endeavor.

—Robert C. Anzaldua, Mission, TX hope we can rely on fair treatment

—Jay Meiske, Victoria, MN

The free and open nature of the internet drives innovation, collaboration, and communication. The introduction of "slow lanes" by the already very slow and expensive ISPs only serves to allow them to strong arm other businesses and suppress competition. This is the fastest way to make North American infrastructure and innovation irrelevant.

—Edward Torbicki, ,

The Internet was created by public funds and should remain public. It was not built by AT&T, Comcast, Time Warner and/or Verizon. The Internet belongs to the people, not to the corporate raiders who will literally do anything for additional currency in their pocket. Loss of net neutrality will legalize allowing Internet Service Providers to discriminate against content they dislike; force websites to pay expedient content delivery thereby, sending the megalithic corporations with their deep pockets to the forefront while increasing the cost of doing business or forcing small business into the extremely slow lane; and if net neutrality is vanquished, America's broadband will become slower, leaving the overwhelming majority of America with no or subpar service. I implore the FCC to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect all Americans true net neutrality. Thank you.

—Wayne Allen, Cookeville, TN

Access to the internet should be attainable and enjoyable by everyone - and big corporations should not dictate all of the terms and fees and service levels.

—Mike Colantino, ,

—Johan Harnesk, ,

I keep getting robo replies from Tom Wheeler saying he's a champion of the free Internet. I want to know if he's telling the truth or just lying like almost all politicians do. If you believe in freedom and America at all, you'll make sure net neutrality stands and is unassailable by any special interests - commercial or ideological!

—Joseph J Pollock, Buffalo, NY

Big corporations already own all of our other means of access to information. The people need to control at least one form of access.

—Judith Allen, Inman, SC

The Telecom need to install fiber optic to the end user rather than simply limit bandwidth or sell preferred access. I'm not much of a movie or TV watcher and I want my content to have the same chance as anyone else's content.

—John Butler, Lexington, OH

The Internet has so much potential to help people share information and democratize our society. Its capacity in these regards has been demonstrated in part by the networked sharing of information that helped overthrow some autocratic regimes in the Middle East during the Arab Spring. In North America, net neutrality is also important, especially given the increasing concentration of mass media in the hands of only a few corporations and the decline of public broadcasters. Please help us to defend this precious resource!

—Stefan Wesche, ,

As a student and academic, the ability to share research and ideas on a global scale is crucial to new scientific development. Regulating the internet in these ways will inhibit the free flow of information, as well as global knowledge and scientific progress

—Alastair Neary, ,

I am retired and cannot afford to pay "extra" for high speed "lanes" on the internet, If you regulate, please regulate in favor of consumers, not in favor of the corporations.

—Susan Steele, Shoreline, WA

no interference from government or any spy agencies...this must be kept out of the hands of profiteers as well.... shame on you if you fail to act in the PUBLIC interest instead of for CORPORATE PROFITEERS.

The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. Earth has already been violated and pillaged, must you now do that to the internet?

—Ethan Mcdoanld, ,

we need the net to be open and neutral

—Bilal Mohammad, ,

One of the fundamental building blocks of modern society is equal access to information - much like telephone or power utilities. This proposal would create a multi-tiered access system where only the richest clients would have access - a fundamental departure from the basic philosophy of the Internet as it has evolved so far. This would lead to an "information disparity" between various economic strata in society - which will only exacerbate the "income disparity" which is already present. In short, the FCC need to ensure that ALL citizens have equal access to information resources - not just the richest and most powerful. That is how you empower members of society. That is how you help them to grow, to better themselves, to work toward that "American Dream" that your nation is so fond of. It is also how you equip individuals and small business to find unique ways to help the nation lift itself out of these recessionary times.

—Lynwood Walker, ,

I am a senior. I'm fortunate to have access to high speed internet where I live. The internet is my access to the world.....to classes and teleseminars, to daily communication with family, to keeping my mind active through accesss to information. I could not afford additional fees.

—Carol Howell, Jefferson, ME

I need a free and neutral infernet to conduct my business, personal and professional affairs. Placing fees and restrictions on its use would make using the web a hardship for ordinary people like me. We must maintain net neutrality.

I think it is very important to me and other people who don't have the where with all to have to pay to use the individual free internet and to let some Hight Powered People get it free and we have to pay. As usual all they want is our money and it is very ridiculous to say the least. Everybody is really getting to damn money hungry and what are they all going to do with it, when they die? They sure as H...I can't take it with them to the grave.

—Anthony Albert, Corvallis, OR

For many such as myself, the Internet is not simply some form of entertainment; it has become a necessary part of everyday life, from research to connections, shopping to taking political action, the Internet being open and accessible is just as important to me as clean running water and electricity. The FCC must realize what the rest of the world already has; the Internet is no longer simply a luxury, but an indispensable part of every day life in our modern age.

—Brian Stevenson, Houston, TX

please kepp internet neutrality without the fast lane for people with money

—Wolfgang Klausling, ,

It is a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It is past time we regulated it as such. Today, in America, we are paying hundreds of dollars to internet service providers like Comcast and Verizon, for so-called “high-speed” internet access that is slower than much of the developed world. In fact, the United States isn’t even in the top 25 when it comes to internet speeds. We come in at 31, behind countries like Bulgaria, Estonia, and Romania. Several cities across the country have freed themselves from the monopoly of the main service providers and the results are outstanding. Lightning-fast internet speeds should not just be in select cities across the U.S. They should be everywhere in this country, urban and rural. The internet was developed by universities and the military and brought into being by an act of Congress. It was never meant to be controlled by giant corporations. It should be a public utility, run by and for We the People, not just another profit line on a giant corporate balance sheet. Sincerely,

—Jenna DiFeo, Incline Village, NV

The Internet should be a level playing field for everyone, to encourage innovation and allow smaller businesses to thrive.

—Susan Cook, Shawnee, KS

It is not a luxury to have telecommunications access; it is a necessity as I no longer have a television and cellular access is not available in my home. I rely on Satellite Internet service for my communications and information. I am a retired Reference Librarian who appreciates the importance of the people having access to an unrestricted and uncensored Internet. Please do the right thing and protect Net Neutrality.
—Gwen Kraft, Hornbrook, CA

the internet should be free from jobs worths deciding what they think we should be able to view. If there are unsavoury or suspect sites they should be shut down by police because of laws broken, not because certain individuals think it wouldn't be in their interests

This is one of the few 'even playing fields' that still exists, must we had everything over to private corporations that couldn't care less about the people?
—, Columbus, OH

For the sake of the democracy we need the ability for people to communicate with one another over the modern communication means. Broadband is a common carrier for this purpose and should be kept open as such.
—Annelise Bazar, San Jose, CA

The larger internet should not be controlled by big business, and that's exactly what the TPP is about. Giving big companies carte blanc to control what we see and do and that's not very democratic!
—Elle Weild, ,

To think that the FCC is planning on allowing a plan to go ahead that clearly has the interests of large coperations in mind is clear tangible proof that the government is not for the people. This is truly a sad day for democracy.

I can hardly get on the internet now please don't let this happen
—Barbara Ellmaker, Chester Springs, PA

As a small yet skilled Software Developer, I am compelled to say that the Internet is "My bread and butter" and many cases my jobs are remote. If my work hurts because I cannot have access to the same lines as the corporations I am working for then there is a problem. One in which I have said I will sue Tom Wheeler for his job to correct if need be. Utility companies such as Telephone, have to provide equal coverage to all customers. The ISPs are a utility company, the Internet is not much different from POTS (plain old Telephone Service). If you wish to be employed for much longer start "respecting" that "fact"

—Robert Emminger, Covington, TN

Big business already rules this country; the last thing we need is for them to buy fast internet lanes to slow down the internet for the rest of us and to constantly push their agendas at the expense of individuals and small companies which cannot compete with their money.

—Donna Rice, Elkton, MD

The free flow of information, present in equal distribution to all members of a society, is an essential element of a democratic society.

—Hedi Saraf, San Francisco, CA

This is one of the most important decisions of this decade, if you choose corporate interest over the freedom and unrestricted access of the Internet you will be dealing a heavy blow to our rights to knowledge, expression, freedom of speech and you will be limiting millions of people in their ability to learn grow and express themselves, free of charge and in a way that is not limited. Do not let corporations dictate what can be seen and can't throw Internet traffic prioritizing.

—Caleb J Morris, Newfane, VT

It's not even questionable. We're talking about humanities future here.

—Lucas Hunold, ,

Equity of access should not be limited by socioeconomic status. Studies have shown that those who benefit the most, in terms of value added educational achievement, are people of lower socioeconomic status drawing upon unfettered access to information. We all share in and benefit from equitable access to the electronic commonwealth. Please allow the internet retain its place as a tool and sit for social uplift by refusing to allow differential speed access based on ability to pay.

—Mark Wilson, ,

It allows people I care about with web-based businesses to thrive, further strengthening our economy.

—Al Cohen, hummelstown, PA

WE will use the US postal service instead of internet and it will crash businesses and it will stop progress in the US. Pray to Jesus who you have ignored for wisdom and develop a relationship with him before it is too late...

—Leslie Anne Mallin-Wilder, Lynnwood, WA

It's important to me because the internet is one of my only ways to promote an up-and-coming small business and communicate with others. Forcing others to pay more for better service (big business WOULD dictate higher prices for standard services) when they're already bogged down with bills would severely hamper people's ability to get the services they need. The destruction of net neutrality would also mean that big conglomerates could actively censor sites that they disagree with for any reason, by slowing down service on those sites. This is too much like a dictatorship. Big conglomerates have shown an enormous lack of empathy towards the common people, and now they're trying to fix things so they can brainwash us with what to think. I will continue to fight this for the rest of my life.

—Natalie Peck, ,

I have been using the Internet since 1983. I met the persons who turned the "internet" over to consumers. I wrote the first contracts for the original ISP's, and the first contracts for video streaming and pay for view. This current attack by certain providers seeking to make more money is contrary to the entire purpose and history of the Internet.

—Susan Lea, Elephant Butte, NM allowing fast lanes for the large companies will prevent startups that don't have the money. This will cause monopolies and drive consumer prices up. Inflation is bad enough, don't make it worse.

—Gary Cole, New Market, AL

The internet is a utility that has become a necessity for everyone, if anything it should be faster and less expensive, like the rest of the industrial countries.

—Herman Rhein, South Padre Island, TX

Net neutrality gives power and advocacy to people. Corporations are not people. Limiting the internet limits people, limits thier ability to fo business, limits thier access to information and services.

—Jean Jeffresd, Oakland, CA

Net Neutrality is important to me.

—Mr Joseph Wincek, PLAINS, PA

The Internet is one of the single greatest inventions of modern civilization. Such restriction and control hinders the creativity, freedom and innovation of the human species. This is the world you are leaving to your children, my children and everyone's children. Take a second to consider your actions.

—Sean Hill, Tallaght,

Big Telecom is making more than they need already. To allow them to downgrade a needed service is a very bad idea and will impact users in a very negative way. Please do your part to keep access to the internet on a level playing field. Thank you.

—Roger Baird, ,

The Internet has become a fundamental communication right. It is too late now for elite powerful interests to exploit it for their own gain.

—Dominic Phillips, ,

Fairness. Net Neutrality ensures fairness.

—Frank Gold, Larkspur, CA

Isn't $200 each month for TV, Internet and phone enough for the likes of Comcast, AT&T, etc.? Now they want to suck even more money out of the clients, give more access to big spenders (business) and take away from the average users unless they to pay more for a 'fast lane'. That is not what the internet is about.

—Michael Arentoft, Atlantic Highlands, NJ

Internet users have the right to expect unhindered access to the content they seek. Any change from the Net Neutrality policy is unacceptable. It's clear there is a solution in reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers. This is the option that needs to be taken!

—Paul MacDonald, Emeryville, CA

I cannot afford to pay for "fast track" service. Must the bottom line always be about money?

—Daniel B Schruender, Rialto, CA

Free speech, unencumbered by money grabbing ISP's and companies. ISP's will monopolize the internet for their streaming services and eliminate other providers not to mention not give regular companies the same speed as media providers.

—Brock, ,

Keep the internet neutral!

—Eric Kessler, Friday Harbor, WA

There is no way that i'll let the internet be prioritised for other. Since the beginning, we are looking for justice and fair. Now this "Slow Lane" proposal is going to break it all apart. I make money from internet, i work on here, but no-where is it written that i'm big and important. So i don't want to be put aside. Stop it, Net Neutrality is the future of internet. Slow Lane is the end of it.

—Gabriel Desroches, ,

Net Neutrality is what I've grown up with. I don't watch cable TV, I don't like it. It doesn't let me accomplish anything. With the internet, I can apply for a job while paying my phone bill while learning a new language while downloading my favorite new video game. I'm not on board for Cable 2.0 and you shouldn't be either. Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Kory Taylor Sexton, Ormond Beach, FL

I believe that everyone should have equal access to the internet. I'm afraid corporations would not have our interest at heart. They would overcharge any website they do not like. They would be controlling our right to free speech.

—Tara Kersick, Festus, MO

It is just plain wrong for any national body to unilaterally make such steep changes to an international infrastructure that is used by so many people outside of its jurisdiction.

—Angela Kalyta, ,

I believe in a democracy, not government for and by large corporations, we are in danger of becoming Germany before World War II.

—Marjelyn Nordhorn, Asheville, NC

Net Neutrality is important to me as I use the internet to stay in contact with my family and friends and to conduct a good part of my business. I also use it for my volunteer work with a non profit.

—Elinor Gannon, Seattle, WA

It would make it extremely difficult to get startup websites off of the ground. Our society is already hugely slanted in favor of Big Business and the plutocracy, they don't need ANOTHER advantage! SAVE NET NEUTRALITY!!!

—Andrew Beachy, Lansing, MI

The internet belongs to the people, not big business. Keep it that way.

—Curtis Lay, Columbus, OH

There needs to be more players in the internet/tv/phone markets. Why are we forced to stick with Telus, Rogers and Bell? Why can't the smaller ISPs get a chance to grow and expand their market share? Why force Canadians to pay premiums that are outrageous compared to our European friends? Stop this madness!

—J W, ,

Take away even more from the people and give it to large corporations - yeah, that always works out. Give me a break, this will be a disaster for the people. The internet is fine the way things are now, Giving it up to corporate America will in no way improve it for anyone but corporate America. Maybe that is whom you actually work for anyway.

—John Benz, Huntington Beach, CA

I use the internet for my small Graphic Design business. It's essential that all sites large and small are free from blocking!

—Andrew Liefer, Jenison, MI

The entire internet will change to a profit-driven enterprise. This is not the way it was designed and the way it works now is VERY fair. Everyone is a winner at the moment. The new rules make the 'corporation' with the deepest pockets the only winner - which gives them even deeper pockets.

—Jon Sheehan, ,

As an engineering professional in the Telecommunications sector, I believe it is critical to the industry to maintain Net Neutrality.

—Jason Hintersteiner, Norwalk, CT

Net neutrality affects the whole world, not just the U.S. As such, the Internet should be regarded as a world commons, not subject to the whims of any one country or powerful lobbyists.

—Gordon and Roslyn Doctorow, ,

The internet is the greatest engine for ideas and social collaboration that has ever existed. Neutrality is essential in maintaining a place for new ideas to emerge and thoughts to be shared freely.

—Jeremy MacArthur, ,

The internet provides unprecedented, unfettered access to information for all citizens. Giving large corporations the ability to control information flow will allow them to block access to data that gives bad publicity or otherwise negatively affects their income and that of their cronies. This is an unacceptable attack on the right of INDIVIDUALS to have free speech. Corporations are not people and they should not control the internet.

—Sarah Fanning, Readlyn, IA

Telecoms are rich enough

—Travis Arment, Lewisville, TX

net neutrality is important because the net belongs to everyone and no one, there should be no barriers for content, freedom of speech is one of it's most valuable principles. If someone produces content and has no money to pay for a fast lane how is that person supposed to show what was done? how does that is not translated as censorship? slowing web services is censorship, what about blocking them? do not mess with the internet.

—Cesar Flores, ,

It is important for education and for many small businesses... It is only for corporate greed and corrupt politicians that anybody would wish to change it....

—Greg Gregg, Berlin Heights, OH

the Bill of Rights says it all! Read it. This country is slowly degenerating into a fascist Empire and anybody who doesn't see it, is either blind or part of the empire.

—William H. karr, Southfield, MI

The internet is essential to my life. Work, play, finances, and communication. If big telecom fucks that up I will have to resort to a foreign encrypted proxy service to live normally. Don't let Canada get fucked, classify big telecom as common couriers.

—Gordon Jennings, ,

Freedom.

—Howie Smith, ,

Everything should be treated equally

—Sarah, ,

Ruining the internet in the US will have an eventual detrimental impact on the rest of the world.

—Jason R Briggs, ,

I stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Mary Bissell, Albuquerque, NM

equality

—Kris Powers, ,

Net neutrality is important to me because it is the ultimate avenue for free speech. It allows people to communicate on a level that has never been possible. If real net neutrality is not fought for and preserved than this wonderful tool of speech can be torn down and controlled by the powerful and rich. Real net neutrality can foster innovative and new technologies. Think about how the Internet has changed our lives since its inception. We can send email, have video chats, purchase items and have them delivered to your door. These could not have happened without net neutrality. If Internet service providers are not classified as common carriers we may not see the next email, Netflix, etc. The Internet service providers would rather control innovation and speech to make the largest amount of money they can gouge. So please reclassify Internet service providers as common carriers. It is in all our best interest.

—Colin B Prothero, Napa, CA

The Internet Neutrality, which we're taking now for granted, is tantamount to the Freedom of Speech, and therefore ANY amount of imposed governmental control WILL surely result, sooner or later in a political censorship of anyone or anything opposed to the "approved" version of the "truth" and/or any type of "political correctness" in general. The best example to support my assertion is amply illustrated by the current unraveling of the most sordid case in the IRS already stained history, targeting the conservative tax-exempt entities, while providing additional, illegal perks to the "progressive" ones... For that reason, even a smallest potential for any future Government interference, obstructing the free flow and exchange of information will have serious, grave and deleterious consequences on our Constitutionally guaranteed Freedom of Speech, and therefore cannot be allowed to stand, if we're wishing to live in a FREE society & World. Vote to STOP immediately this thinly disguised attempt to snatch another slice of our Freedom.

—Michael KLUJ, Canoga Park, CA

Because itsa mah freeddom, feckers

—Andrew, ,

Because I want the "fast lane" for internet too !

—Roberts LaFrance, San Leandro, CA

Let's have a level playing field for internet access. I it ain't broke please don't "fix" it.

—Chris Huculak, ,

You cannot let private bussiness practices to dictate what we can see/how and when we see or access information/nor interfere with speeds. They need to be reclassified as common carriers and they should be banned from lobbying through monetary contibutions which affects the FCC and Gov't from making unbiased decisions.

—Gary Greer, ,

The internet is now taking on the role that the telephone lines served 30-40 years ago, and should therefore be accorded the same position in US society that was taken by the phone lines in that period.

—Miaka Provost, Manchester, NH

One of the main duties of all governments is to decrease the difference among its population. Please, leave the Net neutral.

—Danilo, ,

The internet is our Commons. Our way of communicating with each other. It must be open equally to all, not controlled by a few.

—Heidi Gitterman, Novato, CA

No slow lanes on the internet. No pay-to-play favoritism. If there is going to be monopoly control of the internet, then make it a government monopoly.

—Henry Lowendorf, New Haven, CT

I believe this is very important to democracy. A citizenry engaged in the political process must have access to all viewpoints. I also believe that this would put financially disadvantaged people at a further disadvantage in seeking employment and education opportunities.

—Lyle Elkins, San Diego, CA

We need equal access to information if we are to sustain a democracy.

—Nancy Fomenko, Campbell, CA

This is my way to keep in touch with family in PA, WI, CO, CA, IL and MS

—Mirl W Whitaker, Springfield, IL

I rather enjoy watching & reading things which have views different from mine. By doing so I gain new knowledge of the world around me &, at times, find new opinions to change to. Without the freedom to experience these varying views I feel I will essentially stagnate & die (metaphorically speaking). & I think I'm not the only person out there who thinks like this. As such I think allowing everyone to have access to all this information can improve society. Without that freedom I fear our progress would come to a halt.

—Rikku Dunbar, ,

This is not your decision to make for millions of people. Hear our voices. Keep the internet neutral!

—Craig Braun, Odon, IN

Net neutrality safeguards freedom of speech and equal access to information, communications and connections to others across the globe. Do not put power and profits before people.

—Ana Mourao, ,

The internet should be classified as a utility or infrastructure, like a road or electricity. How many businesses rely on both to be there for them and not ask how much they make in a year first? What about the poor old ladies, like my grandmother, who used email to keep in contact with her family when she was bedridden? Will you really make the people like her, who don't have a lot of time as it is, wait LONGER for pictures of their grandchildren? Do you really want to be an arm of the police state that would allow the government to shut down certain dissenting sites under the guise of "this content doesn't hold with its provider's views." The internet is free for conspiracy nuts and crazy cat ladies alike. Keep it that way.

—Rachel Jones, West Paducah, KY

Keep playing field level re access

—Chris Koch, Webster, NY

Keep the internet uncensored...

—Kevin Taylor, ,

I use the internet daily to get news of the world. Net neutrality is crucial for less visible sites to get information out.

—Gary Blaskowski, Saint Paul, MN

It's a matter of playing fair with all users of the internet regardless of how rich they are. And it's a matter of protecting our democracy.

—S E. Williams, Stafford, TX

It is the only way I have to "speak" to my government.

—Nancy Roessel, Fort White, FL

This is one place where currently all are created equal.

—Marion B. Stillson, Reston, VA

We need to keep Net Neutrality for the good of all. NO special Net for large corps

—Ira Goldman, Boynton Beach, FL

The internet is like having access to a library, I don't want to see a scenario where only those with money can access the internet. Can you imagine if libraries were only open to people with money, what kind of society would you have ? Democracy & freedoms are for every person regardless of their income or status at least that's what I thought America stood for !

—Jamie Bower, ,

Net neutrality is important because I want to still be able to browse the internet without feeling like I live in a policed country. Freedom of expression is the right for all.

—Nicole D'Andrea, ,

The freedom of information for all, rich or poor, should continue be accessible. Look at what is happening in countries that do not have this access for everyone !

—Beth Robinson, ,

Free the markets for more competition for real high speed internet! Separate content providers from internet providers.

—Caspar Willems, San Mateo, CA

Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers - the internet is far too significant to treat as anything less than one of the greatest tools for free speech and democracy ever created. We must do everything within our power to protect it and keep it as such.

—Luke Desmond, Trowbridge,

Because The Internet should be open and free.

—Russell Novkov, Madison, WI

Net Neutrality is the primary reason why the Internet has been such a profound success, and removing it will all but cripple it entirely.

—Stewart Austin, Saint Paul, MN

Net access shouldn't be corporate controlled, but open.

—N Wilson, ,

Neutrality promotes creativity and individuality. Stifle this, and you stifle art. You stifle expression.

—Sorcha Moloney, ,

We built it, not them. We paid for it, not them. We means us, including you, and them means the Oligopoly, excluding you and us. Save us from them.

—Matthew Latimer, ,

Net neutrality is important to me like instant access to my telephone is -- unlimited communication/information, most importantly whenever required, and also whenever desired.

—Peggy Drake, Steuben, ME

Breaking Net Neutrality will move toward an oligopoly, increase income inequality, and greatly reduce the freedoms of the American people.

—Rollin Behrens, Fresno, CA

Big Business has too much influence and control over society as Big Brother looms over the horizon - Look up the word Freedom in the dictionary...individual freedoms are being slowly and quietly removed by government for Big Business - NO MORE!! The internet was designed for freedom of access by EVERYONE!

—Debra Kosolofski, ,

The Internet is not a commodity that shouldn't sold through "a tap." ISP's can make profit by selling bandwidth but shouldn't short change the people who use it by giving sub-par service. There are countries who don't even have the Internet as a standard - let's set an example of fairness in the "first world countries."

Do not sell off the Internet to the corporate interests!

—William La Moy, Syracuse, NY

The internet is the last place that you haven't ruined. Leave it alone. Please.

—Dan Kelman, Springfield, NJ

The internet is the one way we can all stay in touch all over the world. Ours news media is completely corrupt and not to be trusted to cover national and international news. The internet has brought us together as the brothers and sisters we are. Families are not commercial!

Senior on a fixed income.

—Ronald Joyal, ,

How could you possibly think that what you are considering approving is OK and fair to Americans? You are supposed to protect us from the corporations that prey on us. The internet should be protected and service providers reclassified as "common carriers". The internet is the only democracy we have. That is why they are trying to kill it! Think of your children and grandchildren. What kind of a country will they inherit?

DO THE RIGHT THING AND PROTECT THE INTERNET!

—Lillian Feierabend, Cottonwood, CA

In the past telcos such as ATT and Verizon were expected to be neutral in how customers used their product. Today data comm must be unconcerned with how its product is consumed if innovation is continue to blossom. Charging twice for the same data service to facilitate preferential treatment is a abuse of the dominant market position these companies enjoy in large part to earlier government sanctioned monopolies.

—David Lundquist, ,

We need more innovation not more corporate control. Look what's happening with the economy and middle class.

—Mark Rodrigues, ,

I already pay a lot for internet. I wouldn't want to pay even more.

—Nick Yashirin, Gainesville, FL

Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Carlo Benincasa, ,

Ideas come to us in a capitalist society, and we need the internet to gather more information to be innovative. Corporations have gotten greedy, and this will only make the economy worse. Please keep the internet equal to all Americans, we are supposed to be free.

—Rusty Hoyle, SEDRO WOOLLEY, WA

leave it alone... it's not broken... don't try to mend it!

Free expression!

—Drebeza Gladane, ,

If I need to explain why net neutrality is important, you don't understand the Internet.

—Daniel Kettle, ,

Because free, open, and easy access to information should be a human right, not something to profit from. A generation that was raised without the internet as an integral part of their life should not be the people who are making the decisions without consulting the rest of us.

—Thomas Gallo, ,

I have been on email since 1985, and on the Web since the '90's. Net neutrality has been crucial for raising internet speed levels, democratizing conversations, and facilitating conversations between countries and regions of the world. Keep the Net Neutrality - a broadband provider is a Common Carrier.

—Lorie Lucky, Seattle, WA

This is too significant to the United States to allow the future of the internet to be balkanized into private little fiefdoms for large corporations to both make money and also to throttle free expression.

—Jay Roth, Robbinsdale, MN

Because I believe in the constitution: WE THE PEOPLE, not the big corporations.

—Malcolm Oglesby, North Las Vegas, NV

Net Neutrality is extremely important because it may be the last true freedom we have as a global community.

—Beryl, ,

I depend in high-speed broadband internet service to do my work.

—Thomas David Walden, Broken Arrow, OK

Don't let the Internet be manipulated for financial or political profit!!

—Mark Heald, Pleasant Hill, TN

Right now, the content of most communications media is dictated by powerful elite interests. Since its inception, the internet has provided the only free space where non-consensus opinion and ideas can be disseminated and thrive. This has only been possible because of Net Neutrality; take that away and the internet becomes exactly like the other media: a tool that engineers consent on behalf of the powerful. Let's be clear: The fight for Net Neutrality is a battle for the soul of the Internet.

—Francesco Torazzo, ,

I consider the Internet as part of my right to freedom of speech and freedom of assembly. The Internet has always belonged the people in an equal fashion and must always stay that way. Reclassify the Internet as a public utility under Title II for the sake of TRUE net neutrality and keep the Internet FREE and OPEN ... always.

—Rita Larkin, Addison, IL

Net Neutrality supports equality, choice, and creativity on the Internet. It defends freedom of speech.

—Myra Brooks, Morristown, TN

I do business on the internet and anything other than a completely neutral internet is probably the end of that.

—Tom Ricketts, Paonia, CO

it is for the economy stupid

—Ralph Herman, Marion, NC

If slow lanes come along, 90% of the Internet information available to me will be taken down.

It must be reclassified as a utility and the same for everyone!

—Wayne Day, San Francisco, CA

Because it's fair and just.

—Scott Mullin, Portland, OR

It is ridiculous that this control is being sought. Once again, greed is trying to rule the day. DO NOT let this happen for once in your life!

Thank you.

—Laura Boyajian, Phoenix, AZ

The Internet should not be censored.

—, Atkinson, NH

Please preserve the first amendment. This action can destroy the Internet forever. Do not give it away, as so much of the government has been given away, to corporations. It will be the beginning of the end.

—Keith Sheasley, Roseville, MI

Whatever growth the US economy has experienced in the last 20 years has been almost entirely due to the open, equitable internet. Ending net neutrality will compromise this by placing the entire internet under what amounts to a protection racket, creating a high new barrier to innovation.

—Andrew Holliday, , all big telecom wants to do is squeeze every dime they can from everyone as if they don't charge enough for access as it is

—Buddy Swint, Charlottesville, VA

To maintain freedom of information & to keep the Net affordable & not at the commercial mercy of corporations

—Dave King, ,

—Mr. Lloyd Gerald Marshall, Seattle, WA

In a democracy, affordable net access should be available to all of us. It's time to put an end to plutocratic inequality.

—Nicolas S Humphrey Ph.D., Green Bay, WI

this is an artistic outlet for many people and fort some the only way they have to explore and learn about the world around them please do not let that end because comapnies want to make more money off people. It helps so many that is the important part..

—Terry Elliott, Wysox, PA

Equal internet access is a right.

—Nicholas, ,

I use the internet extensively, and depend it for almost all my communications (other than telephone). I am sure the inventors of the internet had no intention of feeding greedy big business. I was meant to improve communication for all, rich and poor, and eliminating net neutrality is a sla in the face of the framers of the constitution, cutting the floor out from under to right to free speech.

—Abigail Howes, Berkley, MA

I want a complete level playing field.

—Steve Matwick, ,

it seems providers would have control over my content and my freedom of access hampered. we need an even playfield.
—valerie Niemann, San Francisco, CA

This militates against a free market, free enterprise and freedom of choice.

Allowing tiered internet will put an unfair burden on small content providers and their customers. Don't allow a corporate takeover of the internet.
—Megan Breid, San Marcos, CA

The youth will rebel and start the much needed revolution.
—Bruce Cahill, Escondido, CA

Free Speech=Net Neutrality, anything less, in my opinion, is unconstitutional.
—Lee Hutchings, Wichita Falls, TX

Net neutrality guarantees effective competition in the internet and network marketplaces. Removing net neutrality enables internet providers to engage in anti-competitive practices, stifling innovation and new businesses. Isn't competition in the free marketplace a major requirement of Capitalism?
—Spencer Weir, ,

We are all supposedly equal under the law, therefore we should all be able to share the internet equally as well.
—Ed Werth, Dallas, TX

I don't know that the services I need will be able to afford the Netflix tariff.
—Eric Ashley, Fort Lauderdale, FL

Not everyone can pay for Big Telecom prices and this technology is not as expensive as they claim. That's the reason why there are several internet providers who doesn't charge huge prices and still offer unlimited internet services
—Gregor Hidalgo, ,

It is vital to the free exchange of ideas which leads to progress in this country.
—John Fusek, Newport News, VA

A free and open internet helps prevent unfair pricing practices. A free and open internet protects freedom of speech. A free and open internet is the single greatest technology of our time, and control should not be at the mercy of corporations.
—Costas Gardias, ,

Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.
—Dina Carrisalez, Perrysburg, OH

Net neutrality is CRITICAL for free, open, democratic discourse and flow of ideas and information around the world - this flow should NOT be determined by corporate interests whose sole ambition is to squeeze these digital avenues for maximum profit!
—Ken Truhan, Denver, CO

Our future freedom depends on Net resources that are allocated in a truly neutral way.

—Sean Brennan, Sebastopol, CA

I'm blind, I use my talking software and the internet to access information that I would otherwise be unable to access. Allowing big telecom to create fast and slow lanes would leave me on the side of the road unable to go anywhere. A open and free internet is critical to me to be able to do all that I currently am able to accomplish.

—Kevan Scott, Colorado Springs, CO

Please, do not let our country join the growing list of nations that are limiting the fair and equal access of the internet to their citizens. The royalty free sharing of the world-wide-web by its creators will go down in history as an extraordinary act of altruism. Please do not re-package that gift with restrictive rules that are paid for by mega corporations. There are so few level playing fields left for the 99%. Please don't take this one away from us too. Be the hero we need and your legacy will be insured. Additionally, I live in Norwich, CT, which is in a digital dead zone for free over the air TV. Since the "digital revolution" in 2009, I no longer have access to anything but public television. I cannot afford cable or the elaborate antenna system needed to receive digital broadcasts in my home. Without the internet as we know it, my access to network TV content and news may very well become limited sometime in the future. Big telecom would not hesitate to slow down, prioritize or block content in the name of the almighty dollar or in their own interest. Please don't put my free speech and liberty at risk by letting them become the guards at the gate of the internet. I do not want an unfeeling corporation to control my internet the way they control their corporate empires. Comcast is a great example! Look at what they already control in terms of media and entertainment, and now they want my internet. This is plainly an information utility built with tax dollars. It should be a common good and the poor can least afford this type of thing.

—Phil Wood, Columbia, MO

Freedom of speech, freedom to learn, freedom to express - all human rights!!

—G H., ,

Net neutrality is important to me because I depend on the internet for information and news and live in a rural area that is poorly served by all the "BIG" players.

—Kristie Knoll, Brentwood, CA

1) Internet innovations in the United States are proceeding slower than in other developed countries, and people in the States can purchase servers overseas that operate at 100Mbps (both down AND up) for a fraction of the cost (about 1/16th) of just purchasing Internet service without the requisite hardware. This has been going on for YEARS with no indication whatsoever that they feel any pressure to update our networks to fiber optic, evidenced by the rollout of Google Fiber in select areas across the nation. The FCC should find this abhorrent and consider it a failure on their part to take action sooner. 2) Mr. Wheeler's previous involvement with the telecom industry may give him experience, but it also presents a conflict of interest when his loyalties to his former employers interferes with his ability to do his job at the FCC. One wonders if this would even be an issue if someone other than he, with no ties to and potentially lucrative offers from the telecom industry, were calling the shots. Should the FCC get this wrong and decide not to regulate ISPs as utilities, a thorough investigation into the backgrounds and dealings of Mr. Wheeler and anyone else in a decision-making capacity over this vital aspect of American life must, and WILL be conducted. ISPs have had more than enough time and money to start an infrastructure upgrade. Giving them the ability to control the speed at which certain content is transmitted and to set prices that will not, and have not, reflected any significant upgrades to our data infrastructure is completely unacceptable, especially since this ruling will give ISPs less incentive to do so, putting us even further behind the curve in information technology than we already are. Do the right thing, FCC. Regulate ISPs as utilities, as we should have done from the very beginning, and let ISPs know that they do not have the right to restrict the flow of information, but rather the obligation to enhance it.

—Marc DeLateur, Spokane, WA

The right to communicate with others should be regulated any more than it already is. We pay to get access to the internet, we should not pay more because large corporations want a bigger piece of us. Make the internet a common carriage issue. Thank you.

—James Martin, Lamoille, NV

the Internet is a Public creation and should be OPEN to ALL. It should not be open ONLY to those with all the MONEY!

—Dana Lucas, Millington, TN

Here on our road in West Virginia where we cannot get fast or reliable internet, we know what your destroying net neutrality will mean for the people of the US.

—Maggie Loudon, Hedgesville, WV

The internet is quickly becoming one of the foundations of our culture; putting it in the hands of private interests seems an awful lot like asking for trouble.

—Graham Jans, ,

The Internet Freedom is the fundamental human right and I will fight in order for you all to not take it away from the rest of us, like you took the rest away. Once it disappears, believe me, we all will know that no one that had proposed these rules are just aristocratic dictators that are just working under the promise of more money and the lives of so many people that depend on the free web will be destroyed. And this can provoke a full-fledged cyber war that would completely destroy the Internet so that even you, the proposers of these rules, will be unable to use it for your own again. So if you all really claim that you support the open Internet, then shelf these rules indifferently and let them never re-emerge again. Only then will I believe your claims, along with the rest of us common Internet users.

—Methusi, ,

Equal access, which includes timing, is fundamental to trust in a democratic society.

—Lynne Coward, Portland, OR

I want affordable internet access no matter where I am and what device I want to use.

—Braden Wilsom, ,

KEEP MY NET FREE AND NEUTRAL

—Dr. Virginia Lubell, Eugene, OR

Free internet permits the exchange of information at all levels, and allows individuals and small business to compete in the open market. Please do not close down access to this market.

—Carolyn Kendall, Lititz, PA

If the Internet goes up anymore then I will be left without it and since I am retired and disabled I will lose all of my fun time period. AT&T, Comcast, Verizon and the rest of the companies do not care about poor people period. And people that are suppose to protect poor people just as yourself, Tom Wheeler, don't. There is no fairness for the poor, not even their living expenses. The Internet Reclassification must be changed to being a Common Carrier period. Also look at these companies satisfaction rating, the worst in the world for the ones I listed so how are they going to make it better? Only for themselves. Reclassify the Internet as a Common Carrier.....

—Ronald Norman, Miami, FL

Net Neutrality is a form of freedom of speech to which everyone in North America has an entitlement.

—Don Keegan, ,

No one entity or few entities own the internet.

—Hubie, Falls Church, VA

Restricting internet access creates an uneven playing field that foments and cultivates undemocratic behaviors/entities such as monopolies. This adds to the already vast imbalances of power within those who are able to manipulate communication and its delivery mechanism effectively due to having more money and those who do not.

—Aparna Bakhle, Los Angeles, CA

It creates a level and equal playing field for all internet users. We do not need more controlling and greedy multi-corporations whatsoever! Keep it simple and keep it fair.

—Karen Newman, ,

High speed internet is a must to educate and communicate. It would be wrong and counter productive to keep high speed internet from the poorer segment of the population. Who knows want anyone can become with the right help.

—James Bruce Current, Paris, KY

..For starters, I would not even KNOW about this betrayal, were it not for the INTERNET. NET NEUTRALITY is to humanity today, what fast runners, the pony x-press, the Telegraph, carrier pigeons, etc., etc., have been to Humanity down through Human History..., COMMUNICATION..., The NEED, the ABILITY, & THE RIGHT of Humanity to EVOLVE..In all the myriad ways that this manifests..., be it Commerce, Education, the exchange of Ideas, News, Medicine, & Basic & Vital Human Relations.. The Internet saves lives every day, because it is the FASTEST form of Information Exchange WE/HUMANITY have at our command.. WE created it..., WE developed it..., But, "CORRUPTION" is now going to "HOLD IT FOR RANSOM"..?? When the Internet is used countless times daily to transfer vital medical information, how many will necessarily DIE then, because many of us will be unable to "PAY"... ??? ...Finem respice..!

—Kyl Wright, Peoria, AZ

I am disabled and use the internet frequently for a majority of my activities. A slower internet will interfere with what I have to do.

—Doran Thomas, Littleton, CO

Net neutrality is of the utmost importance for Canadian small to medium business to remain competitive both inside and outside of Canada. Increases in cost and internet slow lanes will dramatically reduce the ability for Canadian companies to compete against larger corporations and international competitors. While it would seem to boost the Canadian economy on paper by putting money and control into the hands of the larger telecom providers, the negative impact on Canadian companies subject to these costs and controls will far outweigh the benefits. And the negative impact resulting from increased costs and controls will grow exponentially as business practice continues to rely more heavily on internet and cloud technology. This is a critical time for Canadian business, and preserving the integrity of internet regulation has never been more important. I implore you to fight for Canadian business, and Canadian people. Please.

—Jason McKinlay, ,

The Internet is my access to information, a way to pursue art projects, social interaction (as I am disabled), as well as simple entertainment. I do not want any Internet provider to have power over what I can see or how rapidly I can access it. It is bad enough that I have to pay $60 a month for the privilege.

—Pat Gargaetas, Crescent City, CA

Internet neutrality is vital in order to protect democracy through personal freedom and freedom of communication without interference from the government interests (who are simply the employed representatives of the people) and corporate interests (who are simply the providers to the people of goods and services which enable the nation of people to go about their lives).

—Paul Walsh-Roberts, ,

No fast lane for fat cats-let them slim down and join the rest of us. Don't be a dingo!

—David Hull, Wilmington, DE

We are supposed to be a free country, not the pawns of the media controllers. Give our children a chance to resurrect the real America. Right now the propaganda via the media is massive in creating lack of awareness, teaching stupidity, pushing money as the most important thing in life and extreme violence and sex. We need fair and democratic ONLY control of internet, not possession by the mega corps.

—Victoria Grandetta, Newberg, OR

Canada already has high prices for internet. As a user and owner of several websites, I already pay for usage & hosting. I cant imagine paying even more!! Plus, how can smaller businesses compete with big ones this way? Don't kill small business, its hard enough!

—Magdalena M, ,

This is an outrage. You are literally giving Big Business the opportunity to strangle competitors with a two tier system. Please wake up and realize the future of the Internet and even free speech is at stake.

—Chris den Engelsman, ,

Thanks to Net Neutrality, we were and will be able to discover new talents as independent Webcomic authors, amazing web series that can't fit Hollywood standards, different points of view about politics, economics, technology that broden our horizons, and bring new solutions to the problems we're facing right now. Net neutrality IS the future of our culture, our economy... Companies that go against it now may be dead tomorrow, so let's protect it as we protect the freedom of entrepreneurship, the freedom of speech, etc. Thank you.

—PLeaz Numero, ,

Because my livelihood depends on it.

—Gil Ireland-Ashley, Sonoma, CA

The neutrality, availability and equal ubiquity is what made of the internet what it is today, and it is my feeling that it should be preserved for everyones benefit.

—Fernando Nunes, ,

One of the most progressive measures that any government in the world can take is to promote good communication for its population and to promote that for others as well. Privatising and throttling the internet is a regressive and dangerous infringement on human progress and should not be supported by any government anywhere in the world.

—David Beeman, ,

Stop aligning with big money. Net neutrality is vital for all.

—Ernie Howard, Asheville, NC

we are little people with a small voice because we little money. Help us!

—Jennifer, ,

Common carriage is our right!

—Rod Evans, ,

everyone mut have equal access!!

—Mr. Greg Barsoski, Toronto, ON

Net Neutrality is important to not just me, but to all of us. There are way too many examples in this Country that people with money have influence over way too many of our decision makers. If you end Net Neutrality, you make that reality even more impactful. Please show us that you can't be bought, and we can't be undermined, by protecting Net Neutrality.

—Sharon S Dymowski, Alexandria, VA

I don't want the big companies to be able to buy their way to the front door. Without Neutrality makes it more difficult for small companies and individuals with new ideas

—Mr. Ted Goldstein, old Westbury, NY

We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Purnima Barve, King of Prussia, PA

The internet should be an open, level commons for everyone, not the property of telecom companies. Please don't give in to commercial pressures. Keep this jewel of communication sparkling!

—Dr. John Markowitz, New York, NY

Because, more fees isn't better.

—Dean Jenkins, ,

We should all have equal access.

—Susan Walp, Pasadena, CA

The conglomerate monopoly at the heart of the tiered plan want it both ways: they want tax breaks that fall under Title 14 Public Utilities and the big profit that they see will come from a tiered system. Our current system isn't broken, in fact, it has more potential toward free enterprise than ever before. At a critical moment in our nation's history, when the tanking economy has decimated the livelihoods of so many citizens, re-classifying the Internet would be absolute folly. I realize that the Chairman of the FCC has used Net Neutrality as a smoke screen to cover his own support of a tiered system. It's time for government agencies to stand in support of the Citizens of the United States and hear what we are saying - we demand Net Neutrality! It's not longer a matter of opinion or debate: as you assess the overwhelming feedback coming from the public, you can plainly see, Net Neutrality is the ONLY course you can take.

—Nicholas Chase, Eugene, OR

It's the main way for people to keep informed and learn these days!

—Michael Gnat, Brooklyn, NY

Please don't allow BigMoney to screw US even more. We can hardly afford TV and Internet now!

—James Brydon, Oakland, MD

I should be able to access what I want to on the internet and am sick of governments trying to interfere just so that large telecom companies can make more money and have greater control over our lives. I'm also sick of governments trying to make big policy changes without properly consulting the public. The internet has become a key aspect of many people's lives - almost a necessity of life - it needs to be affordable and accessible.

—Jen MacGregor, ,

I need continued access, and I especially need to see equal access for information sources that may be inconvenient to those with more money than me.

—William Hewes, Simi Valley, CA

Equal access for reasonable prices

—Lara Scarborough, Kennett Square, PA

Private data policing and surveillance, opening the doors to limiting service based on content, and providing further supports for entrenched multinational corporations over start-ups and small businesses... why does any of that sound like a good idea?

—Mark Austin, Bozeman, MT

We all know that the Internet fosters consumerism. That's one of the foundations of the modern US economy. By removing net neutrality, consumerism on the Internet will suffer greatly, risking people's spending habits and potentially making the Internet a ghost town. This would be a tremendous step backward for everyone. Keep the Net Neutral!

—Paul, ,

Keep the internet net neutral. Many of us can just barely pay the fees for internet service now. To add new fees and policies would make it non accessible to a percentage of the population. We cannot afford the additional charges this proposal would enforce. I believe it would also hinder the large increase we have seen in ecommerce. Small business's already struggle with the many costs of running a business. Adding more will force some of those businesses to close. Do not make the internet accessible for the elite only!

—Diane Tricker, ,

We are a 'free' country and should remain so...

—Fem, ,

Our freedom is not your domain.

—Robert McCall, ,

I am 81 years old and spend most of my day on the internet. The internet is a utility that I have never paid for and I don't see any reason to do so now except for the fact that big telecom companies want to charge me for something that should be free. I live on social security and I can't afford that.

—Charles King, Gainesville, FL

Net neutrality preserves freedom and a level playing field for small businesses and consumers alike.

—Stephen Means, Mc Cordsville, IN

In Canada citizens have suffered for years from anti-competitive, arbitrary throttling by ISPs who also have government-supported monopolies in cable and phone networks. These actions are typically decided in secret, require high technical skills to correctly identify, and often take years to get overturned, if they are overturned at all. While there are sometimes grounds for limited censorship even in democratic societies, allowing corporations to censor content at will without due process muzzles free speech and free association - core principles of any democratic society. Ultimately, that is what net neutrality is all about - should corporations be able to restrict the natural rights of free association and free speech online arbitrarily without due process?

—Geoff Harvey, ,

Freedom

—Kelly Nix, ,

U.S. citizens have enough control by corporate influence in our media. Keep the internet open and free to all!

—Sandra L Lawrence, Kerrville, TX

Censorship and big business are bogus!

—John Webb, Saint Louis, MO

My business will not survive without net neutrality. The internet is a public utility. The FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers." Anything else is corporate-government corruption!

—David Arntson, Bothell, WA

The free flow of information, regardless of the source, content or whether we agree with it or not, is the strongest basis for a free society. If we allow any entity - government, business, the wealthy - to control what information we can access in any way, that limits our freedoms. Allowing new/additional changes would harm the poor, startup and small businesses, non-profit organizations and numerous other individuals and organizations who do not have the funds to pay additional fees.

—Amelia Holden-McMurray, Fayette, IA

To protect the neutrality of the Internet.

—Mr. Art Jaszczyk, Thornhill,, ON

The FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers."

—Dennis Lee, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me because I'm a very senior citizen & on a limited income but I have just as much right to an open, easily accessed, & expedient internet as young and/or rich people & rich corporations. Net Neutrality is rather like the sun or the wind or water; the product each produces should be regulated so everyone has a fair chance to make use of them & at a reasonable price. Net Neutrality should be considered a utility regulated like any other utility.

—Pat Palmer, Indianola, IA

An Internet Service Provider should not have the right to decide which sites can be access quickly. That's ridiculous.

—Joel Fieber, ,

I talk to friends and relatives that I don't see very often.It keeps people in touch.

—Duane Foster, ,

Commerce and technological innovation for the last 20 year has depended on a free and open network. Destroying that will end the only current viable and working form of innovation in such critical areas.

—Zachery Jensen, Draper, UT

As pensioners we cannot pay big fees for faster access, as rural dwellers the internet is a lifeline for us. There are thousands in a similar position. Please protect Net Neutrality by classifying broadband providers as common carriers.

—Gill Tennant, ,

it's a basic human right first and foremost rather than the preserve of big business

—Babs Mary Nicgriogair, ,

I would like to see the USA lead the world in technology not hinder it!

—Lee Taylor, Port Saint Lucie, FL

—Kathleen McDonnell, ,

We can't have service providers controlling a public utility".

—Mr. June & Gordon W. Brown, Lone Tree, CO

I can keep contact with family and friends!

—Joan B. B.Miller, Chipley, FL

Everyday in my life, I am using the Internet. Working, advertisement, entertainment, gaming, reading, sharing, family contact. The internet IS my life. The old ways of communication are over, please "grow up"... The big telecoms are enough rich as it is. Let us have options to have access to "everything" from information to entertainment.

—Alix Rocheleau, ,

The FCC has only proven their strong ability to fail in the past, and now with their track record they expect to do something "good" for the internet? This can surely only end in disaster.

—Sean Clayton Freel, , no matter what our income, we should all have equal access to information.

—Gisela V. Manley, Yreka, CA

The cost of living is already a daily struggle for so many people. Gas, food, keeping a roof over your head. Just leave the damn internet alone you bloody savages!!!

—Chris Warner, ,

The internet is the most powerful thing that has happened to humanity since the inception of democracy. We can not let it be reserved for the rich.

—Tony Gilmour, ,

Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité.

—Vaughan Shelby, Yorktown Heights, NY

I need to have the same access to the internet that I have now, free of charge at the local library, to do my grass roots thing. The giant telecoms all ready have enough power.

—Joel V. Johnson, Vancouver, WA

The internet belongs to the people, not to giant corporations. Net neutrality is especially essential or people like me who are starting up small businesses, and don't have resources to pay extortion to the big providers to be able to get our information out to the world, and extortion is what it amounts to if you allow the big telecom corporations to control it. Please consider the little guys in making your decision. Government of the people should be by the people, for the people, not by giant corporations for giant corporations.

—Jan Cook, Ames, IA

Do I have to paint you a picture of your corruption of the FREE INTERNET

—Shawn Jensen, Mesa, AZ

The internet is a free zone of expression and no entity should have the ability to control any aspect of it! If we give them an inch they will take a mile!

—Allan T Dinegar, Rego Park, NY

I should have equal access to everything on the internet. I should decide what I want to use my bandwidth on, not the company I am already paying for access to the internet.

—Matthew Kemp, ,

Please Don't destroy the Internet!!!

—Marjorie Freeman, Marshall, AR

Net Neutrality is need to maintain a fair and open internet, not one that is controlled by big business and the richest jackasses in the world.

—David, ,

The thing we love the most about the Internet is that it's a level playing field for free expression, economic opportunity, and innovation. But Big Telecom is trying to squeeze more money from Internet users by destroying the free and open Internet that people everywhere built together. These telecom giants are pushing rules that would force everybody who can't afford the outrageous new fees into an Internet slow lane. The future of innovation and creativity online depends on an open Internet.

—William Brant, Palm Coast, FL

I'm retired. I have to prioritize paying my bills. And my Internet bill is already to expensive.

—Mr. Ralph Riddle, Cupertino, CA

Without properly neutral, free, and open internet, ideas and innovation will be subservient to the whims of the rich and powerful. We must keep information and the internet open for the benefit of all.

—Fraser, ,

Net communication should be freely available to ALL

—Mr. Bill Merrill, Minneapolis, MN

Net neutrality is highly important to me, simply because I believe in complete freedom of speech, and if you people let these telecom companies get away with their plans, you will hold the ultimate responsibility for censoring the basic freedom of speech we enjoy now. Besides, those corporations have enough money and keep raising their prices for mediocre services at best. It's time the government left us alone, or better yet, stood up for the people and not the corporations.

—Michael Shields, Mio, MI

Common carriers please...or they'll price me out of the market...listen to DISH!

—, Buckhannon, WV

because I am a pensioner on a very low income who cannot afford higher internet charges...that's why I don't have satellite or cable tv, just the internet, which I use to keep up to date on world affairs and keep in touch with family !!!

—Frank, ,

Equality seems to be the latest insult to the wealthy and the corporations. Corporations whine to get exemptions from environmental law, wealthy people can commit manslaughter without consequence. Prioritizing access and high speeds for paying customers would destroy one of the last great institutions serving the intellect and preserving equality.

—Jeffrey Panciera, Seattle, WA

Absolute power corrupts absolutely. We know this to be true. To do this under the notion that it will allow powerful companies to share the good times with customers is every bit as foolish as it sounds. They're not doing it for that reason. You're not doing it for that reason. And the American people know it.

—Phil Gilmore, West Valley, UT

I don't want to have big firms decide which pieces of data to go faster. I think it is a money grab and there will be no increase in speed in the "fast lane", it will be degradation of service in the "slow lane"

—Connie Walsh, ,

—Mark Ring, Seattle, WA

Net Neutrality = Democracy

—Karen Marie Sullivan, Weslaco, TX

I want free internet, I pay enough now just to go on line!!

—Linda J Crosby, Wheeler, WI

As far as I know the internet was developed largely at government expense. It belongs to the people, not to a handful of gangsters who will continue the extortion racket of stealing from the poor to enrich the rich but, of course, that seems to be what the US is all about anyway.

—Forrest Jewell, lock haven, PA

I respect freedom
—Adam, Troutville, VA

People don't want fewer options or to pay more for less or be tracked, monitored or be accept the proposed changes under this new agreement. If governments believed people wanted this, these meetings would not be so secretive.
—Carrie Oliver, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me and to the human race to preserve our abundant diversity. Even the corporate elites will regret such a move when they see how it actually decreases their profits.
—Colleen Blacklock, Oneonta, NY

I opposed to giving commercial companies the right to control the flow of data. It is an infringement of the democratic principles on which the WWW was constructed. The basic principle of democracy - equal access for all - must be enshrined in your decision. This means - among other things - no to a two-tier internet, and yes to Net Neutrality - which means Yes to the reclassification of ISPs as common carriers.
—Gordon Kennedy, ,

Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. This is what America is about until SCOTUS changed that corporations are PEOPLE! And destroyed parts of the civil rights act for voting protections and destroying affirmative action, America is becoming all about the rich and powerful and everyday citizens have less and less power in what the government does! The Net Neutrality changes that the FCC want to change will effect everyone from toddlers to elderly that use computers! We have thousands of people who use computers in our county libraries! These are people who do not have the money for computers or Internet access in their home! Net Neutrality is essential for ALL Americans! This MUST BE CONSIDERED!
—Paul Markillie, Grand Blanc, MI

Equal access to the net is imperative.
—Thomas Jones, ,

The market should be free. Not manipulated artificially. The internet is a utility in America in this day and age. We cannot let Verizon, Comcast, et al decide what internet one gets charged for and what internet one doesn't get charged for. Especially when they would be favoring products they own, as NBC in Comcast s case.
—Gerardo Talavera, Brookline, MA

The internet and the shared collaboration around the world is what made the Net a useful place to share and exchange information. Don't allow monopolistic Big Telecom to use their $$$'s to control the data on the internet.
—Ian Sheffield, ,

I want the internet to be free for everyone!
—Rhonda Sorrow, Nicholson, GA

Internet companies already make way too much profit for the shitty service they provide. Stop hindering progress forward by letting rich companies become more wealthy for no reason.
—Hugh Griffin, Groton, CT

Reclassification is the only way to sustain genuine net neutrality, and save the communication system that democracy requires.
—Ted Dreier, Portland, OR

Corporations with the biggest wallet absolutely should not dictate rules. They should remain absolutely equal for all.

—Andrew Ian MacLeod, ,

Net neutrality is as important as free speech. Please reclassify all internet providers as "common carriers".

—Jonathan Bailin, Los Angeles, CA

Free access to the internet means free access to all the information and connections on it. The two lane policy will restrict access by wealth and therefore by politics, the same way dictatorships keep information secret to all but the powerful. This policy is a big step away from democracy. Dump it! Keep the internet free!

—Angela Holden, Hopewell Junction, NY

Cheaper big telecom companies swim in money when the working class is drowning paying 300+dollars for overage fees

—Jordan, ,

There should not be a further two-tier system in the U.S. The internet should be equality for all.

—Ken Gale, New York, NY

Net Neutrality is very important to me because I receive emails daily and send out emails daily without interference from big corporations like Verizon, Time-Warner, and AT&T. And other corporations that want to buy the Internet.

—Gayle B. Rosenberry, Baltimore, MD

Big business will censor information that should be readily available to everyone, cable tv news is doing this now. Our only source of good info is the net.

—Francis Hall, Duluth, GA

The United States has been cultivating a culture of control for decades, intent on ossifying its global geopolitical dominance. This impulse is certainly natural, as we all would wish to freeze our best moment in life and melt it down until we die. However, this impulse is also short-sighted and dangerous. The U.S. government has become virtually indistinguishable from the great corporations, which, in fact, are multinational and therefore not intrinsically dedicated to our nation. These corporations work closely with government, constructing fruitful contracts whose contents are classified. The freedom-loving American must question the opacity of U.S. media with such knowledge. The government now wishes to control information through media to influence and censor its populace. Clearly, when such a story seems to include the government as a person, said government is completely out of hand. The government should never be an agent acting on its own people. The government should be an agent of the people. The recent efforts to emasculate internet freedom by selling exposure piecewise to the richest companies is yet another attempt at compromising Americans' rights to information, business, and expression. So few would benefit from the proposed slow-lane calibration, and so many would suffer. That the U.S. government is actively trying to contravene its own constitution in order to strip rights away from its populace is becoming less and less obscured. Big brother, more and more obvious.

—Stephen Powers, Chattanooga, TN

I'm a small business owner. A majority of my bookings, research & promotion happen online. I could never even dream of competing with corporations for bandwidth. Net neutrality is essential for students, small business owners & families to stay connected in the modern age.

—Gitanjali J Hursh, Portland, OR

It is as important to me as it is important to everyone, everyone should have equal use of the internet. We do NOT need a fast lane.

—Skylar LaFond, Clarkesville, GA

The Gov takes more and more of my money without me giving more to some big telecom giant no no no

—Roger, ,

The internet is a common carrier. "Privileges" on a common carrier should not be for sale to the highest bidders.

—Helen Pearlman, San Jose, CA

All web traffic should be equal,

—Daniel Etapa, Chicago, IL

The Internet needs to be classified as a utility just like electricity. The Internet needs to be available at the same speed to everyone that uses it. I use it. I want to receive my data as quickly as any wealthy person or business. Please give us regular people equal access. I Need and want Net Neutrality.

—Ann Palmer, Indianola, IA

At this late date in the life on internet, tagging on tolls appears to be nothing but a money grab. It is actually quite a blatant money grab!

—Yvonne Dunn, ,

Internet always had the utopic idea of a free world. We know this will never be reached, but this slow lane will make it so un-free it is just wrong.

—Merijn van Arenalts, ,

It is important that the Federal Communication Commission retain control over the internet. Allowing internet service providers create the framework is not in the best interests of the American People.

—Brian Levin, Camano Island, WA

Knowledge and information should be free and equally accessible for everyone. No fast or slow lanes.

The internet belongs to everyone and should be free.

—Hans Fried, ,

Mr. Wheeler (FCC), I have worked in IT for over 30 years. I have seen things come and go, be useful and useless, except the web, internet or whatever you want to call it. The idea of a "fast lane" for "special people" is all against what the web was set out to be, open. Many lives will be affected if the super highway is implemented, including my own. Open internet has provided business growth for companies large and small, provided us with entertainment by streaming video, banking, investing, music, video, weather, news and telephone. Consumers do not need and want to be split into segments by your super three ISP's that make a lot of money off us already with high charges for tv, land and cell phones. Making any change to add a "high speed lane" will inhibit growth to small companies that rely on the web for business and most likely will increase the cost of purchases thru the web from companies to offset the cost of internet connectivity and even raise the cost for home users. The internet is working fine as it is! As a consumer, web user, citizen and IT professional, please don't allow any changes. Thank you, Mr. M. Kwitt

—Michael Kwitt, Warren, MI

There is no need to 'fix' the existing system; it isn't broken. Someone in a position to make a difference needs to finally take a stand and represent the wishes of the people and not those of self interested companies.

—Derek walsh, ,

This is very important to both me and the future of the internet

—Hank deRonde, Mesa, AZ

Time Warner and the rest of them have ruined cable tv and now they want to ruin the internet. They are losing customers by the droves because of their big plans. Stop them from ruining the internet before you are out looking for a new job FCC. The FCC is useless anymore and has let the big Telcom ruin the internet.

—Mr. Rickey Palmer, Akron, OH

I have an online shop through Etsy which may not be able to afford premium access. Slower loading time would directly affect shoppers ability to access and buy from our shop. Please continue to make the internet accessible for all!

—Heather Warkentin, ,

Equal access to all content at all times is key to any democracy.

—J Haskins, ,

The Internet was designed to be free and open, and it is imperative that it remains that way.

—Steve Moss, ,

Free speech is what makes the internet great.

—Christopher Rogers, Westminster, CO

It is the only way to preserve real speech equality in the digital age. Limiting access by requiring higher premiums is absolutely a restriction on the sharing of ideas and knowledge on an unprecedented scale.

I don't like people taking what isn't theirs, shouldn't that go without saying?

—Ben Thomas, ,

Net Neutrality enables innovation for all!

—Karaline Reimer, ,

Whether you are rich or poor, you should have the right to the internet.

—Sheila Tran, Hartley, IA

Net Neutrality is important to me because it promotes competition in the ISP market.

—Clayton Burkholder, ,

Without net neutrality, the internet will no longer be the democratizing influence that it currently is. As things stand right now, the internet allows everyone a truly equal voice, an equal opportunity to be heard. But if net neutrality is removed, then only the people with money and power will have the influence to have their voices heard. The everyday person with less resources will have their voice drowned out, as they will not be able to pay to play like the big corporations and wealthy will. Please, please don't let this happen. Ensure that ISPs are required to give everyone the same bandwidth and the same services, and not pick and choose who gets heard and who doesn't.

—Juanita Herrell, ,

I am a student that requires a free and open Internet. Please keep it this way

—Ilex Farrell, Wauconda, IL

Net Neutrality is the ONLY fair way to go!

—Vera Love, Horseshoe Bay, TX

This will stifle innovation as smaller companies can't compete with larger corporations.

—James Padgett, Clinton, MA

The internet is where people can get in touch, where they can seek information, where like-minded individuals can form groups. It should not have information from tech giants come a minutes, hours, or days before information from experts. It is tragic that almost EVERYTHING is for sale in this country. Do your part to keep this what it really is, a public utility, not subject to corporate greed.

—Carolyn A. Kidder, Wayne, PA

Don't touch the internet!

—Stefano Petraz, ,

I want a free and democratic internet. This way the little guy gets as much time as the big guys. Otherwise, the big guys are the only ones we will hear from!

—Lillian Hyland, Lake Worth, FL

Is everything in the world just one big cash grab for the greedy? People built this and it will continue to grow and evolve as it should without signing it all over to corporations.

—Esa Lehti, ,

No interference with my Internet traffic.

—Mr. Michael Heinrichs, Ottawa, ON

Because I and I only am responsible for what I want to see, no one else.

There shouldn't be different tiers of access. All websites should be allowed the same scale of access.

—Mr. Jackie Gour, Victoria, BC

This is fascism clear and simple...We want our Democracy back. If this puts me on a list somewhere, so be it. What more can they take away?

—Diana Maloney, ,

The internet is the most important tool for free speech that we have in America. The current bill that you have set forth would be the freedom and equality of the internet at risk. The fast lanes that you have proposed could be easily manipulated to increase profit for large ISPs such as a comcast. This is a huge concern for me both as a consumer and as an American citizen. The freedoms that this country give me are important to me and shouldn't be stripped away. The rights of the American people should outweigh the voice of lobbyists from big businesses. I urge to amend this bill in order to protect the infrastructure of the internet.

—Ryan Martinez, Boise, ID

Net Neutrality is essential to the circulation of knowledge, culture, innovations, and political thought today. Broadband providers need to be reclassified as common carriers to insure full and free access to a spectrum of content without obstructions and slow downs. Thank you.

—Tony Cokes, Providence, RI

I'm not a millionaire, neither are most Americans. You don't need a rocket scientists to understand why most people don't want to be left out or slowed down by those who have more than they deserve. Stop serving the interests of the few. The needs of the many outweigh it. The more participants in a free and open net, the more people there are to generate a robust economy. Mr. Wheeler should not profit from his decision, but I would wager that he is doing the rich mans bidding for his own reward and at the expense of everyone else. Stop acting stupid and keep the internet free and open to all. You don't need excuses to decide the fate of an open and free internet unless you have something personally to gain by it. Stop catering to the rich and help those who are stymied by them. It should be a reward in and of itself.

—Greg Zyzanski, Lyndhurst, OH

My dream is to someday start a internet startup and provide new innovative services to America and the rest of the world. What the FCC is trying to do to the net will kill my dream. All in the name of corporate greed. The internet belongs to the people, not corporations.

—Roland Poulter, Seattle, WA

Everyone should have access to the internet.

—Chris Hanratty, ,

Why should big telecom companies be able to charge high tolls for premium access and block or slow down websites that can't afford the high fees. Reclassify Internet service providers as common carriers I support an open internet for all.

I have used the Internet since it began as the Arpanet and use it most of the day for many things.

—Jack Milton, Davis, CA

I know in my heart that if the internet remains open and free for expression and use then one day it will revolutionize governance and personal rights. We must keep the net neutral, less we are doomed to retard mankind's global-community expansion and technological advances, far greater than what we already have. It would be a blow to mankind greater or equal to the snuffing of Tesla's free energy technologies. Ignore these requests and we will retaliate with a force of greater magnitude than the sun itself.

We're bringing the world together in a way that has never been achieved before and we don't want to lose that because somebody needs to make even more money.

Passing this proposal will only feed the monster and cripple one of the best tools for access to knowledge, learning, connection, and unlimited other uses that EVERYBODY can reach. This is only baking another huge pie just so Big Business's greedy fingers can get wrist deep in it.

Democracy will die without the free flow of truthful information and access to it.
—Allison Metzger, Phoenix, AZ

An open internet is just as important as our Declaration of Independence! We are an America of the people and for the people. If these "slow lanes" are created we have just thrown the peoples freedom in the trash.
—Jessika Ojea, Wonder Lake, IL

Do not prevent the public from forming their own opinions!
—Martin Baclija, Indio, CA

I want the internet to promote freedom and to accessible to everyone, not just the people/corporations with the most money.

Please not let the big business, who only care about profits not progress, rip apart the great invention that is Internet.
—Dr Ilya V Sverdlov, ,

Smothering out the competition due to funds is not the way to go.
—Scott Baitz, ,

Net neutrality is important to me because Common carriage fosters innovation and investment and reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. As Americans, we should be free to enjoy whatever content (barring things that are already illegal like child pornography) we choose.
—Jeanine Terranella, Elk Grove Village, IL

It is unfortunate that the common people must fight to retain affordability over corporate profits in many aspects of our lives. When a government sides with corporate profit the people loose and the government abandons its responsibility to the people who elected them into power. Once before the U.S. government was shown the power of the people over the net to retain freedom from censorship and the current net neutrality issue is also about freedom from censorship as lack of affordability and access is in reality a form of censorship. Should the FCC allow the corporations to change the face of the internet then I assume that the people will justifiably once again show the government the power of people. We are legion, we are one.
—Jim Clulow, ,

It is our last stand to protect the little bit of Democracy we have left. Just imagine having just two or even one corporation in the future. Do you really think that would be OK? Please re-classify all providers to common carriers. Not to do so, is the end of democracy. It is the same as what made Hitler possible with the only difference that todays methods are more sophisticated. The end result could easily be the same.
—Helmut Zitzwitz, Ponte Vedra Beach, FL

Without net neutrality new small innovative businesses will have a harder time battling with larger established businesses. Thus stifling innovation.
—Karl Dearden, ,

Over control of anything is never a good thing.

—Joanna Lynn, ,

Ending Net Neutrality would allow major telecom companies to engage in coercive pricing and monopolistic practices on the Internet. As a small business owner, I fear for the future of my business and of American free enterprise if Net Neutrality disappears. As an American, I shudder at the implications for free speech and free expression when a handful of large companies are allowed to decide who can use the Internet and how much it costs to be heard.

—Aaron Severson, Los Angeles, CA

THE INTERNET SHOULDN'T BE ONLY FOR RICH PEOPLE AND BIG BUSINESS!

THE INTERNET IS OPEN DOMAIN & SHOULD BE KEPT THIS WAY!

—Mrs. & Bruce Revesz, Cedar Grove, NJ

The internet has been an important way for global and national society to progress. We need to keep it equally available to everyone to complete, maintain, and expand that progress.

—Chris Andrews, ,

Lack of Net Neutrality would further inequality which, in turn, would further destroy our Democracy.

—D J Boykin, Bedford, TX

Even job applications require internet access now. The internet is just as important as phone access.

—Lynn Shulak, Racine, WI

We all, big or small, rich or poor, deserve the same freedom of access to information.

Don't Destroy the Internet

—Tomislav Kostoski, ,

Everyone has the same right of open informations - it is not (Your) right to take away net neutrality!!!!

—Susanne Freiberg, ,

We all want a better internet without corruption and other thing that ruin the internet.

—Paul S., Victorville, CA

Dear FCC members, a free and open internet is needed to provide an open exchange of ideas and promote innovation. Forcing speed restrictions on those least able to pay for more access can stifle developers and in effect force a form of censorship on internet users.

—Paul Brenstrom, Littleton, CO

Leave the Net alone. Everyone can get information fast. Already, advertisements are popping up when I do a Google search. I don't like this and certainly do not want to see any other policy that directs in any way my access to information.

—Louise Harmony, Baltimore, MD

Corporations need to grow with the times and invent new ways to protect the material they claim is so important rather than trying to get everyone else to bend to their will. All the actions they have taken in the past decade have just shown them to hunger for money rather than protect the artist's work they exploit on a daily basis. If they spend the money lobbied to control the internet they would have long ago created a system that they would no longer need to worry about piracy. But then they are scared of change and driven by fear to not change and keep things how they are comfortable with... So that is why net neutrality is important. To keep scared little children from taking away something great for everyone just because they do not understand its potential and functionality. The net needs to keep growing. So that technology can progress, so that needed information can reach its destination. Putting chains on that will just ruin it for everyone

—Robert Symbol, ,

It's my source of information and access to knowledge.

—Susan C Wilkie, Lakewood, WA

This is 21st century technology that the people NEED to communicate in today's business, social and economic environment! It's barely affordable now for some people and by increasing rates and limiting services, you are essentially stripping your own citizens of their abilities, rights and freedoms to function in this age of technology. Shame on you if you don't support the notion that ALL PEOPLE should have access to information and technology!

—J Thompson, ,

Net Neutrality is important because it preserves the free market principles that I believe in. It is also crucial for having a truly free press, which is essential to democracy. A vote against Net Neutrality is a vote against democratic principles.

—Gina Clemens, Panama City, FL

The internet is my best source of essential information. Don't allow the monster corporations to deprive me of this right.

—Mrs. Annette Bork, Irvine, CA

The most prominent problems the human kind will face in the future are global and need global collaboration to solve them. Collaboration requires that people across the world can share the same information (from the Internet) and are able to communicate with each other (through Internet). The business models used by most of the current day companies are profit-driven instead of happiness-driven. Towards the future, this way of thinking just doesn't suit anymore. Collaboration = Open = Net Neutrality!

—Ruud Beukema, ,

Net Neutrality and an open internet are the last resorts of the common man to have any say in what happens to him.

—Kevin Oldham, Shirley, NY

There is enough crushing of freedom, please stop this

—Robert Dye, ,

Because it allows start ups to compete with well established corporation in many ways. It benefits to everyone.

—Guillaume Jobin, ,

Small businesses should be able to compete with big businesses, that is the basis of our commerce system. Creating fast lanes will prevent businesses with less money from competing with bigger businesses.

—Chris Armitage, Midvale, UT

A free and open internet is the single greatest technology of our time; free access to all citizens should not be at the mercy of corporations. A free and open internet promotes the spread of ideas and innovation, and protects freedom of speech.

—Joseph Pacheco, Cape Coral, FL

It's democracy!!!

—Kenneth Proper, Tucson, AZ

Both our generation and they future ones are dependent on the internet. Are you going to stifle creativity by letting an unfair access policy? How will new businesses compete? How will young entrepreneurs get a foot hold. Giving those with a lot of money unfair control and access is just WRONG and you implementing this will go down in history as one of your greatest mistakes.

—David Hicks, ,

Net neutrality - real net neutrality, not the currently proposed so-called open Internet - is the Internet-age component of free speech.

—Alan R. Brown, New York, NY

keep your noises out of our business and try and get the government out of the hold and quit trying to drag the people down in your hole.

A free and open internet is nearly the only real method of learning what is happening in a world controlled by large corporations and multi-millionaires.

—Cheryl Vezey, Portland, OR

Until recently the internet has been pretty open and I can find information I need fairly quickly, particularly for research for my businesss. This bill will mess that process up and also make it difficult for small suppliers of goods to work on a level playing field commercially.

—Chris Bullen, ,

Internet belongs to all - equally. Big money should not have a "better,faster" internet at the expense of everyone else.

Its successful as is; supports the freedom of speech amendment. Too many problems with corporate greed if its changed.

—Robert Fitch, Leonia, NJ

We need net neutrality because it gives us (the 98 %) a voice. We don't need more corporate control-there is too much in our lives already(elections and birth control).

—Mrs. Debra I Moore, Clio, MI

Freedom of Speech is Net Neutrality, It,s just another money grab

—Rose Weaver, ,

Net Neutrality is very important to me because it protect my right to on-line free speech and helps keep the Internet free from control-minded corporate interests.

—Steven Millan, Las Vegas, NV

The Net is not big business playground!

—Timothy Spurlin, Cape Girardeau, MO

Small business will never be able to compete if big business is allowed to pay for privileged access. Consumers are also best served in a common-carrier situation that will stimulate competition and bring faster service at a lower price.

—Ronn Williams, Sioux Falls, SD

Because its like air in the sky. Should be free to use for everyone!

—Bruce, ,

Without access to a free and open Internet, my world would shrink to the inside of my room. I'm sure I am not alone. the "pay to play" concept is only beneficial to the giant corporations and not to the users.

—Ed McCaig, ,

Net neutrality is essential element of real freedom.

—Dean M, ,

Net neutrality is absolutely critical to the usefulness of the internet as a tool of information exchange. By abandoning such principles, the internet stands to become nothing more than a shopping mall or TV station, throttled and controlled by money. The internet is a forum and platform for open communication and exchange of ideas, not corporate extravagance and profiteering.

—Karel Vaclavik, ,

My work for the last 20 years has been in developing new business using the internet, allowing people in remote areas to earn a living. Without net neutrality this will no longer be possible, increasing rural poverty. Please vote against this change, and for democracy.

—Andrew Sloss, ,

This is no less than a utility and much more than a utility in the sense that it is a foundation of an individual's personality and a personally identifiable quality that absolutely must be private and totally neutral of outside influence in today's world.

—Colin Bowen, Lehigh Acres, FL

I think that keeping the net neutral is key to the maintenance of our democracy. Please keep us, The People, in mind as you act on this divisive issue.

—Marsha Roberts, Santa Rosa, CA

Thank you.

—The Rev. Allan B. Jones, Santa Rosa, CA

Net Neutrality is important because the internet is one of the greatest technological advances of our time and net neutrality protects freedom of expression and thought. Control of one of the greatest advances of our time should not be under the control of corporations.

—Jason Wells, ,

The Internet does not belong to you. You have no power here. Any attacks on the internet will be met with social upheaval and revolution. Know it. Your businesses will fall, they will collapse and decay into nothing; if you continue to push in this direction.

—Andrew Kuess, ,

I am a small business owner and spend several hours daily reading articles that will help me with my business. Without net neutrality, I will have to waste lots more time waiting to send and receive important communications.

—Shirley Wallack, Santa Rosa, CA

The internet is a modern day utility.

—Napoleon Salvail, Titusville, FL

Free and open internet should not be just for the wealthy in our society. Everyone should be entitled to this informational tool. Do not let Big Telecom further increase their crooked price gouging of consumers to the detriment of the not-as-wealthy in society.

—Bill & Fran Reddy, ,

Isn't this the whole point of the internet, equal access?

—Eileen Chieco, Ashland, OR

Without a free and open internet none of the innovations we enjoy today would be available. There's no need to go back to the day when the phone co. had to come or and fix your phone and your only choices you had were what the phone company wanted you to have. Since the internet is the new communications medium, those entities that have worked to get a monopoly want to take us back to those days, only with the internet. Please keep the internet free and open - don't drag us back into the dark ages just so some trick telco/cable cronies can make a buck. One also has to consider the social engineering aspect as well - without net neutrality, free and open interchange of information will be a thing of the past, and the only information available will be what the big players want you to see. Do the democratic thing.

—Gregory Havenga, Austin, TX

I use the internet everyday so that I can work from my home office. My employer does not cover the cost of an internet connection so it would be up to me to cover the costs that would undoubtedly rise in order to have a connection fast enough to work on. I already only have one option for an internet provider that has a fast enough connection, and the cost is already double what the other companies charge. Please consider the needs of average people instead of only what businesses want. Thank you

—Tracy Brock, Madison, WI

Net neutrality is essential for both innovation and for free political speech. What if a company decides to slow down the traffic to a website that it politically disagrees with? Because internet carriers are private entities, the first amendment does not protect citizens, so the government must take steps.

—Thomas D Hendrickson, University Place, WA

you people in the US should be citing your First Amendment Right. Why aren't you?

—Jacqueline McKay, ,

There's one word that expresses how important Net Neutrality is and that word is FREEDOM!

—Sue D'Onofrio, Keysville, VA

Ultra important. Freedom of expression. Freedom period.

Aren't the American people a Free People and therefore not confined by the controls of an Orwellian 1%? What a grave grave error it would be to destroy this blessed gift, a gift which provides so much knowledge and enjoyment to all.

—C G, Boulder, CO

Once upon a time we weren't sure what the internet was. But we've now had 20 years to figure that out. And 'we' includes Chairman Wheeler. The Internet's role in our country's economy as well as polity is no different from the role of telephony for more than 120 years before broadband redefined - not e-communications but - capacity, speed and thereby, its very necessity. to our democracy. A Democratic President's chosen leader is either upholding the People' interest or he is a sell-out by this President to big business. Declare all Internet carriers the 21st century equivalent of classic electronic common carriage. Do it now.

—Joe Tocci, Fort Wayne, IN

Why should the wealthy blue-stockings have better access to the Internet? Remember the French Revolution and the events which led up to it. The Internet should be classed as a "common carrier".

—W Paul C Hamilton, ,

I work at home and I CAN'T afford another "bill" to pay!!!!

—Linda Butler, Virginia Beach, VA

It's about equal opportunity

—Tyler Steffanson, College Place, WA

We already lag behind the rest of the modern world in access to broadband internet. The last thing we need is to destroy Net Neutrality by giving telecom companies the power to send people to the slow lane.

—Rebecca Stuurwold, KALAMAZOO, MI

First of all, internet service must be classified as a utility. It is embedded and essential in every aspect of our lives, in the same way that the roads and bridges of our community are. When you turn on your computer and connect to the internet, the world must be available to you, regardless of your economic status. Access to information must be effectively free, unless it is protected by copywrite, deemed private by national Constitution, the result of illegality or classified for security reasons. If you tier the internet, you destroy a fundamental right. Without net neutrality, Democracy is dead, forever. That is not hyperbole.

—Joseph Urla, New York, NY

I'm opposed to control of the internet by powerful business interests.

The internet is something used by billions and should be run for those billions, not for rich companies. Keep the net open and free of corporations' meddling so that I can work and make a living.

—Cai, ,

My only source for entertainment/news is audio/video podcasts put out by independent content producers, this could make it harder for them to produce the content I enjoy.

—Mark Williams, ,

I'm home bound & I depend on the internet for information and access. I shop, pay my bills, keep in touch w/family etc.. It's my life line. I don't need another entity making decisions for me or trying to make money at my expense.

—Kerry Moore, Toledo, WA

Freedom of Speech is a basic American right. Without the protection of Net Neutrality, corporate greed will have bought that out from under us along with our electoral process and the Supreme Court.

—Liz Amsden, Los Angeles, CA

Equal speed for all carriers without extra fees. I don't want to be forced to use a monopoly.

—, Hawthorne, CA

We "little people" can't afford to be charged for everything out there.

—Barbara Schrader, Galena, MO

Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Mike Swarbrick, ,

Free "speech" is essential regardless of the medium over which it is conveyed. One shouldn't have to pay to have their voice heard over another.

—Patrick, ,

Classifying Broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from interfering with websites they don't like. This is the only way to protect real Net Neutrality.

—John Kelley, Menands, NY

Please don't do this. It will slow down progress and the distribution of ideas dramatically.

—Brendan Young, ,

Because the internet is designed to be free and open, and if we give the control over to big companies, they'll turn it into a profit center, cutting off lower income people from access to a fantastic tool!

—Daniel Leach, Chino Hills, CA

As a full-time at home caregiver, I depend on the Internet as my lifeline. Therefore, it is vital to me that the Internet remain open to all, not just to those with deep pockets. The Internet has moved beyond being just a luxury, it has become a necessity and, as such, it needs to be safeguarded against attempts to co-opt it by private concerns strictly as a means to achieve capital gain. This issue is extremely important to me and most other informed Internet users. I urge you to do everything in your power to return unfettered Internet access to ALL of us, not just those who can afford to buy special consideration. It's the right thing to do. Thank you.

—Andrew Denning, Glen Oaks, NY

Our society relies on the internet in so many ways that it must be accessible to everyone who wants or needs to have access to the internet. We rely so much on emails in business and in our personal lives that it has become part of our cultural identity. Don't destroy this! D. Lafleur

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Janice Antill, ,

No one company or group of companies should be able to restrict the flow of information or commerce at a whim. This smacks of censorship, pure and simple. Keep the net neutral!

—Doug Thompson, Hollister, CA

The free creativity of the internet, including new bussiness models, is a result of every content producer and service being able to deliver its data equally to the recipient. If Net Neutrality is dropped, new competitors will be discriminated against well-established ones with high amounts of money available, and the internet will lose its unique kind of productivity. Removing Net Neutrality cripples the net.

The internet is one of the last places where everyone is equal and has equal access to content. This proposal will kill that and allow ISP's to exploit their customers by blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps they don't like--so lets keep the Net neutral with an open playing field.

—Malcolm Naylor, ,

The open internet is the only truly democratic institution available in the modern world. Elections are bought and sold, and politicians once elected represent lobbyists, not the electorate. But businesses and ideas win or loose on the internet based SOLELY on their ability to draw and keep a sufficiently large group of "fans", whether they are customers, clients or a community. Obviously, corporate interests want to kill that. Just because your boss is one of their shills does NOT mean you have to give in. Keep the net neutral.

—Alison Cowan, ,

The net must remain neural in order to prevent the monopolies from developing and squeezing the small businesses out of existence.

—Rick Underhill, Blue Ridge, GA

Leave the internet the way it is. It is equal for all to use which is what makes it special!

Net neutrality allows unfettered access to the Internet without the biased interference of Internet companies filtering our content and blocking us from knowing about any inconvenient facts and truths. Without net neutrality, the Internet becomes commercial television channels.

—Darren Gyde, ,

Net neutrality is vital to safeguard our First Amendment Right to Free Speech. It is unconscionable even to consider letting the likes of Comcast and AT&T have their way, and charge for equal access to the internet. Most of the population would not be able to pay and would become second class citizens, without a voice, while corporate America would rule the internet with their greed & lies. Do your job and protect our freedom! Show some integrity! Show some backbone! Don't sell your soul to Big Telecom or there will be hell to pay! We, the People will not allow you to sell us out! Period. End of story.

—Georgia Kahn, Novato, CA

Net Neutrality is the principle that the Internet needs in order to continue to thrive. Introducing steep tolls for a premium connection websites and services may not be able to afford could restrict business and cause people to lose jobs if unable to afford such prices when being inevitably forced into the slow lane.

—Jesse Perez, Bronx, NY

The internet is public domain and a reflection of our global village and how it functions, for all its beauty and ugliness, and absolutely must remain the same.

—Trevor Smith, ,

The Net should be free to all users.

—Linda Tabb, North Hills, CA

I want to have a small business and can't afford to pay extra for "fast lane" traffic. Keep the internet fair and equitable!

—, Stewartstown, PA

The internet has, over the past decades, become the dominant platform for communication and free expression. Any bias or restriction to accessibility on this platform will invariably cause a schism in who can functionally access what, as well as who can functionally make information available, creating an environment that stifles the atmosphere of innovation that has allowed the internet to reach its current state in the first place.

—Christopher Kloppinger-Todd, Montgomery Village, MD

We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

I am on a fixed income and want to keep being able to use the internet as I have been. Also, I want to be able to get merchandise from small businesses which don't have the money to pay extra for their services to be brought to the public.
—Nancy Kilgore, Olympia, WA

20 years ago people started to see internet as a tool made for everyone. A tool that would help people to communicate with each other, no matter where you were or your economic status. A tool to make the world smaller and more balanced, to weaken regimes and to stop secrecy. If this premium toll is put in place, everything the internet is will die, the regimes will recover strength, the secrets will remain and the world will be disconnected once again.

The Internet belongs to no one Nation or company, It belongs to those who use it, those whose lives depend upon it earn money and survive these hard times. Your companies Still make large profit margins; You have no such right to ask for more and then to have the nerve to try to divide the Internet into an almost a 'class' system. If you have any level of common sense, surely you could for see this will not sit well? But then again common sense is incredibly short in positions of power and responsibility...

Restrictions on internet speed will restrict access to content that is not seen as profitable to some telecom corporations. Startups, small and medium businesses opportunities online will be made more difficult. Those are the businesses paying their fair amount of taxes, hiring local talents and benefiting the communities the most. Removing the internet neutrality will only benefit a few handful already extremely powerful corporations. There is no added value for the government or the customers. Internet neutrality should stay.

What is the Internet if not a technological democracy? Anybody can be heard on equal footing with anybody else, by anyone at all with the requisite technology. Believe it or not, there is more to society and culture than the products provided by massive corporations the likes of which are trying to turn our technological democracy into an oligarchy. Ordinary people are the ones using the Internet, and ordinary people are the ones whose voices would be disadvantaged by the demise of Net Neutrality. When objectivity and equality are lost in the most influential public forum in the history of humanity in one of the "freest" countries in the world, what hope is there for freedom of expression in the future, and in places that need it the most?

The Internet is for the most part the intellectual vehicle that brings the world together, and broadens users' horizons by offering the ability to experience content they wouldn't normally encounter. I want to be able to use the internet at high speeds, whatever website I'm on. I don't think it's fair that big businesses like Google and Facebook will be able to have faster webpages just because they have more money. What would happen to all the websites supported purely by donations, and not run by big companies? What would happen to Wikipedia, to reddit, to all of the great websites which would not be able to support themselves if they had to pay for speed? Think about it.

We don't need another cable tv system where you can only view certain channels. It seems like that's were we're headed however, with multi-facade storefronts selling the same merchandise. Capitalism just don't work because there's no way to enforce competition and therefore everything drifts to price fixing and one supplier makes all and sells through various facades that all charge the same price. Sounds a lot like gasoline varying a penny or two from one station to the next. We need to insure that we don't encourage this behavior which is what tiered pricing will do. It's going to force out the mom & pops leaving only the behemoths behind.

With the post office in fiscal chaos, higher rates are inevitable. Monthly bills however aren't going to stop. To cover these additional cost some utilities, are already charging a fee to the sent a bill. The internet has now become an essential service, it is no longer a mere source of distraction. Allowing further increases and multi tier systems will disenfranchise many from this essential service. Providing the internet was one of the USA's greatest gifts to humankind. Establishing Net Neutrality in a common carrier situation was a wise act. Changing all that to favour Big Telecom AND Government surveillance is simply wrong. Furthermore, as a Canadian I know that our current Harper government would be quick to follow - against the wishes of our internet using public. Please revert to the American good-heartedness that gave the internet to the world.

—Michael J. Spadoni, Rail Road Flat, CA

I have expressed my opinion numerous times to the FCC. Ending Net Neutrality will end the Internet because the vast majority of people using it would not be able to afford the fees to be in the "fast lane". Disgust at being stuck in the "slow lane" along with almost all of the most interesting websites will provoke people into not using the Internet at all. The only sites left will be those owned by large corporations and maybe government sites. Who would bother to pay for Internet access if those were the only websites choices? Kill Net Neutrality - kill the Internet. Is that really what you want to do?

—Aimee Polekoff, Lansdale, PA

It is essential that I have an open, unsullied source for the information I receive.

—Janis Sawyer, Santa Rosa Bch, FL

Ending Net Neutrality would only cripple the economy and cripple the hopes and dreams of many Americans who desperately rely on the open internet for information that is important to them. When you go to the bookstore and purchase a book, you buy the entire book. Not chapters in between. This is comparable to what would happen if Net Neutrality ended.

I work as CTO for an internet start up dependent upon transferring small amounts of data infrequently, but very quickly to many users. We won't be gaining revenue until we launch our product and we really don't have the funds to be burdened with additional service costs to maintain data transfers at the existing speeds we have already built for. While I cannot speak for all small businesses in this field, I can speak for those that I know and work with. A change such as this would be prohibitive and detrimental to entrepreneurial endeavours. Discouraging new business and innovation is backwards and acts contrary to stable economics so I can only see this hurting everyone in the end. Besides, this particular change doesn't really make sense. Consider a website like a shop on a street. Customers pay to commute to the shop and transport goods and services received there. Customers may transport a lot and they cover the cost of that, including if it takes multiple trips. Customers may walk/swim slowly or buy a bike/boat or even insure, fuel and maintain a motorized vehicle to get there. This proposal is like putting a toll gate on all roadways to the shop and only allowing pedestrian access unless the shop pays the toll. How does this make sense? This cost is just a backwards way of charging users for their usage (like a mobile data plan) and in order to stay solvent, many web-based businesses will simply have to pass this cost on to all users or go bust. On a personal level, I live in Canada where we are already being charged ridiculously for low quality service in a monopolistic system full of collusion between our telecommunication options. There are clear parallels between this proposal's system and the broken system in place here in Canada. All this will do is make things worse for people and slow progress. Ask yourself: Who is this law for? Does this help or hurt the people the FCC is accountable to? Does this decision make good sense for the economy?

The Corporations did not accept the NET when it first appeared. They were the last ones to get on board when it was starting up. It was the common people who made it happen. The Corporations thought it was a joke for doing business on, a pleasant distraction for the little people is what they thought. Then they realized there was money to be made and got on board. Then they got greedy as usual and want to own the whole thing now. If net neutrality disappears, then so will trust of the people who use it. If the people know it's just another Corporate owned entity they will go to the sub web. The underground web where they can go and do anything they want without being tracked or seen. It will become popular to do this. Is this what you want to happen? You're improper action will supply incentive to people to do this more frequently than they are doing it now. I will stop ordering things online and go back to the good old days of telephone purchasing.

Simply put, so corporations... A) cannot control/manipulate yet another outlet of free-thought and expression for the masses. Corporate America has already polluted the democratic system enough. Businesses already have ads plastered all over our favourite websites and now we want to give them a physical advantage? B) are not given priority over the individual citizens. Corporations are not entitled to special treatment, nor are they the majority of internet users. If you want to make the right decision, let the internet decide it's own fate. Create a secure online poll for affected citizens. I guarantee you the decision would undoubtedly be in the favour of net neutrality. Thank you, Kevin

It's important to me because Internet access is today's telephone -- that's why using the "common carrier law" makes so much sense for the Internet. Companies were able to make huge profits under the common carrier law, so history shows, the law doesn't limit growth or profitability. It encourages innovation and competition, and should improve service overall. We have the slowest Internet of any western nation. Giving special access to big players will only make the problem worse, and make the US less competitive on the global stage.

—Janet Leadholm, Minneapolis, MN

The Internet has spawned so many innovative programs and may continue to do so, but only if it isn't fettered by monied interests who are only concerned with protecting their market share at any cost. Including the future of this country. Common carrier status seems the only way to prevent this from happening. It is only the neutrality of the internet that has fostered such innovation.

—Leslie Mundy, East Amherst, NY

Net neutrality is important because businesses, schools, and students everywhere depend on it for the sustaining of our economy and living conditions. Destroy net neutrality, and you destroy the economy and our livelihood with it. The whole world depends on the Internet...and it will never forgive you if you destroy net neutrality.

—Kelby Baca, Odessa, TX

I stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. I urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

These kinds of restrictions and prices will force most users of the Web to drop their subscriptions as the slowlane proposal will destroy their access. This will mean less profits to your precious companies and you will be shooting yourselves in the foot just as the music industry has by charging such high prices for CDs and allowing downloading of music. Also, the internet gives freedom of information to many who currently cannot afford or don't have access to newspapers, books, television or radio. You will stunt their education and reduce people's creativity. What you are proposing is a shameful and it reeks of totalitarian control coupled with moving towards a complete police state.

—Tibor Bozi, ,

I love the Internet because it's such an important part of free speech and creativity. To take that away will destroy many of the freedoms that our ancestors fought for in the American Revolution. It will stifle creative voices. Many people who met through the Internet may not even be able to keep communicating, and many other meetings might never happen at all. And I doubt the freedom-taking will end with the Internet. What would be in danger next? Please keep Net Neutrality in action.

—Pete Wilson, Pahoa, HI

The current attempt to restrict internet usage is in direct conflict our constitutional rights of freedom of speech and freedom of expression. Giving control of the internet to anyone, (person or corporation) would elevate censorship to the world stage, controlling what we see, what we hear, and almost every expect of our existence. Why not give an individual control of the air that we breath? The idea of such control is beyond human comprehension. Even the consideration of such is the foolishness of despicable men.

I use the internet in all aspects of my life such as watching movies, researching ways of raising children, banking, my professional career as a developer, helping worthy causes, etc I am not alone in this so creating an internet slow lane will have a devastating impact on everyone; professionally, personally and financially. This will also greatly effect online stores (especially gaming & multimedia) once their customer base can no longer afford internet that is fast enough to handle their "products". Also if you look at the global statistics for internet speed (<http://www.netindex.com/download/allcountries/>) you will find that we are already in the internet slow lane but yet have higher internet costs than a lot of countries. We need to be pushing for faster speeds not slowing things down even more.

Dear FCC, Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it users may have fewer options and a less diverse Internet. A pay-to-play Internet worries me because ISPs could act as the gatekeepers to their subscribers. The Internet is important to me because, as a college business student, I need to know that there will not be barriers to entry for the new ideas and services that I hope to bring to the marketplace. If ISP subscribers have an easier time loading websites of existing companies than my new innovative product, there's no way that I will be able to compete or succeed. Sincerely, Jake Guerreiro

Equal access should not be dependent on one's ability to pay. Otherwise, only the rich will have full service.

—Robert Edwards, Wilkes-Barre, PA

I see the Internet as a resource that anyone can connect to and research whatever they need or want. To allow the big telecom services to hold hostage the content by allowing only the sites that pay more to load faster, shows that Congress really does not understand what it's fuelling this proposal. The large Telecoms being allowed to decide what pages it's users can load faster will allow the Telecoms to force feed their own doctrine and influence many younger generations because they will not want to wait to see something that is contrary to the fast streaming sites. It would allow BIG Business to take control of the country without truly looking like it. Their opinions would be the general consensus because no one would know better. Please take this into consideration when you make your decision.

—Amanda, ,

I am a senior on a fixed income who is dependent on the internet for many services. The internet is incredibly slow here, and I don't want it any slower. Net Neutrality is the only policy that can keep the net affordable

—Stephen Shubert, Friday Harbor, WA

The Internet is for everyone to be able to use equally--without Net Neutrality, rich corporations will be able to use their clout to bend the usage in the ways they want it for themselves and the wealthy---they will be in (1) tier of usage and the rest of us will have to make due with what is left available to all of us. That's not NET NEUTRALITY, is it????

—Bob Soper, Portland, OR

The proposed policy is bad for the education of America's youth. I have worked with the urban poor for years and believe that the future of America depends on educating her youth and the proposed action will interfere with this goal by making their access more expensive and/or take more time and/or place limits on access. Any action with the potential to do any of these is BAD POLICY! Further, to favor wealthy corporations and anyone wealthy enough to buy government over the individual American citizen who is struggling economically (as seems the position and policy of the Republican/Tea party) erodes the confidence of ordinary citizens in the government. It is no long "government BY the people and FOR the people" - it is government for the rich and powerful and corporate entities. Shame on you if you authorize implementation of this policy/action!!!

—Janis Hollenbeck, Saint Paul, MN

Allowing a two-speed Internet equals letting the biggest companies charging us so we can get what we already have and the smallest ones giving us a slower access to their sites. Nothing good can come out of this segregation.

Net neutrality is important for me and for everyone - corporations should not be given the ability to have cheaper access to the internet and enjoy its benefits, while everyone else has to pay extra to have access.

—Dan DeGooyer Jr, Somerville, MA

Freedom of speech is a fundamental human right - not something that should be controlled and dispensed by the wealthy and powerful as only they see fit.

—Nancy McShane, ,

We are already paying disproportionately huge prices just to get on the net. We should be able to see what WE want, when we want. This should not be a piece on the corporate game board!

—Pamela Corradini, Simi Valley, CA

Individuals should have the right to affordable and open access of information and ideas. To deny access to broad spectrum information is the equivalent to a gag order. NOT ACCEPTABLE.

—Judy Duff, ,

Net neutrality is important because as the Internet grows, it needs to be widely available at a low cost for everyone with every website included. It also slows down competition that is needed online and in real life, which is needed for the economy. Modern-day business is highly reliant on the Internet, and abolishing net neutrality will ruin the use of Internet for business, due to the fact that their data will probably be discriminated against if net neutrality is abolished. The Internet also transfers information and culture faster than anything, which are two important things for society.

—Robert Koys, La Grange, IL

I'm against lining the pockets of large telecoms, at the cost of freedom. Internet freedom means start-up, small business owner, and entrepreneurial freedom; an equal playing field for everyone to start. Things which would be sacrificed for a slow lane.

—Elise, ,

Because people deserve internet freedom, If you take away that from the net then we lose our sense of democracy, most of the worlds countries are democratic so you should let us have a say in it. I am not willing to pay extra money on internet to get better speeds. Personally I think the internet should be free because it is something that can be very educational, if you take away the education you take away childrens futures. DO NOT GO AHEAD WITH THIS PLAN!!!!!!

—Kiam Guest, ,

This is extremely important as the internet is a worldly social connection as well a worldly social expression, and to start limiting what can be expressed begins the process of one-way communication.

To protect our democratic ways of life. Proposed censorship is a step away from fascism.

—Alexander Kozlov, ,

There is probably more communication now coursing through Internet Providers "pipes" than through common wire line providers. As such, the ISP's are indeed common carriers and should be classified as such.

—Alan Lambert, Los Altos, CA

The alternative to open internet is completely unacceptable, and not why the net was ever developed.

—Alan Layard, ,

So the truth can be told, nothing but the truth and the entire truth and at this point it's all we have left as corporations own and control the media and what they report. All governments and corporations which control governments worldwide have no ethics or principals and are currently going to great lengths to control our every move and to own everything we need. If they don't win today they'll be back in a few months until the masses get so pissed we take to the streets and revolt. This move to take over the internet is yet another attempt to control our every move and spy on our every action. Net neutrality is about retaining our freedoms which are quickly being eroded.

innovation

—Wil, ,

It is clear to any of us who are forced to use them, because of the monopoly they hold, that the giant telecom companies do not have the public's interest in mind as they make their mergers and power plays. If they are allowed to, they will apply the same standards to the Internet that they apply to their customers: great service for the rich, lousy for the poor. Reclassifying internet service providers as common carriers will level the playing field, and prevent them from creating slow lanes for the poor, interfering with websites, or blocking content they don't like. It is imperative that the FCC take this action, because everyone else is on the take, and the mega corporations have plenty of money to buy influence. The FCC has the power to do the right thing without worrying about reelection, or acquiring more power and influence, as most elected officials now focus on exclusively. Please, do the right thing: reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Oran Sandel, Silver Spring, MD

I value my ability to seek out information anywhere I choose, without being channeled by internet throttling. I value being able to choose who I do business with based on their ability to serve me, not their ability to pay to reach me. I value an Internet with infinite possibility for anyone who wants to seek it, not a privileged few who can pay, or demand others to pay.

—Megan Subilia, Ridgway, PA

Asymmetrical access speeds and cost, coupled with the ability for the rich to "buy" preferred access, will cripple the even playing field we now use.

—Joseph Andrus, Edmonton,

I am tired of big business ripping me off!

—Dale Mackintosh, ,

Net Neutrality is both a vital and important part of every individual's right to express their ideas, share their thoughts and opinions, and communicate and stay in touch with loved ones, family and friends. The Internet as a whole has always been a place of open and free expression. It is one of the most valuable tools that society has at its disposal. It is there to educate, to inform, to provide communication through social mediums where other means of communication may be limited or unavailable by phone or slow mail. It provides a quick and easy route to stay on top of topics and events that affect and revolve around our daily lives by keeping us informed and in touch with others and what goes on around the world we live in through live news feeds and social mediums. Since its inception of the first working prototype of the Internet in the late 1960s with the creation of ARPANET, it has been a means and a tool to communicate abroad, both effectively, efficiently, and with quick ease of use in mind. If the FCC's current proposal were to go through, it would give the power to allow Big Telecom companies to overcharge, and hike up prices for Internet services that individual consumers, families, businesses, educational institutions, government institutional services, and military services are already paying for. It would also allow the Big Telecom companies to have full control over how speed and access to the internet is gained by leveraging, (as they see fit), who can have access to what for a premium cost, as long as the individual or consumers are able to pay the high costs. Those that can't afford new price hikes for existing Internet services that they are already paying for, are at a risk of having their services slowed down, or interrupted because of the inability to view and gain access to content, resources, and social mediums, and other services that were once normally and easily accessible. I do not want to see Big Telecom companies seize power and strip away the fair rights that every individual has to a fair, free, and openly expressive internet. Our Internet was built upon the sole principle and values of everything I have aforementioned. We can not deny ourselves the fact that the greatest tool we have at our disposal, is one that is an extension of ourselves, and that we use in our everyday lives. It exists on our smartphones, laptops, computers, tablets, Smart TVs, and any other electronic devices we may own. It is a part of our society, why hinder it by limiting, restricting, regulating, and trying to take control of something so wonderful as open and free expression on the Internet.

—Alex, ,

I like to browse a large variety of websites. I can often find useful information on smaller websites and forums, where as large, wealthy websites do not have this information, as they focus on what is relevant to them.

—Patrick Roy, ,

I am a disabled person on a low income who depends on the Internet as a line of communication. Raising Net access prices would cut me off from the outside world. Allowing telecom corporations to raise their prices to whatever they like would discriminate between the haves and the have nots even more, silencing people like me and oppressing us even more than we already are.

—Renee C Mulhare, Tewksbury, MA

Access to free information, thoughts, ideas and all forms of communication between people who would otherwise never communicate with each other enables the world to solve problems together. Knowledge should never be isolated and kept from anyone willing to learn, develop solutions, or who want to start a dialogue that will make the world we live in a better place for everyone. We are all human beings and should all have the right to share freely, otherwise this is no longer a democracy but a dictatorship where freedom of thought and speech are meaningless and innovation is stunted. You hurt the many to benefit the few, whose motivation is centered around monetary gain rather than societal growth. No government, agency, or corporation has a right to control information, communication, or the sharing of any data in a true democratic society.

—Jacqueline Stathis, ,

Net Neutrality is important, since it allows all individuals and companies to be on a level playing field. If it is taken away, then big corporations will take over the Internet and it will lack any freedom or innovation.

—Andrew Locky, ,

For once, don't let big businesses interests out way those of regular people. Please.

—Samantha Gough, ,

Free internet is an important part of our democracy.

—Judi Poulson, Fairmont, MN

This Internet is available to everyone and freely searchable to connect with others, research and shop, among the resources available today. Without net neutrality, that will no longer be true and only the entities with huge bankrolls will be able to buy an audience. Ignorance will prevail, small businesses will suffer and the sharing of personal, familial, and objective knowledge will be the casualties.

—Toni Tempel Navarro, Colchester, VT

We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Axel Schulz, ,

I am a pensioner and can't afford an increase in cost of anything let alone the internet and I do want net neutrality and abhor censorship of any kind. Don't do this to us pensioners Mr. Wheeler.

Many other Australians are in the same position so keep your greedy corporate buddies hands off it.

—Errol Pugh, ,

This neutrality on economic terms alone is CRITICAL. Small and Medium sized businesses are the source of 70% of NEW employment in North America. The growth of the Middle Class HAS to trump BIG Business interests once and for all. Or we are ALL doomed to economic disaster. The free unfettered internet is the ONLY possible way for the little guy to hope to create some opportunity for himself and herself and their families. It's time to say NO to giant Corporations. Come on People. BE BRAVE! JUST ONCE! BE BRAVE!

People should not have to pay access fees to use the internet. We already pay for our internet provider at exorbitant rates. Tom Wheeler, you keep saying you're for an open internet, but your actions aren't supporting your words. Quit courting big telecom companies.

—Margaret Wilbur, East Harwich, MA

The Big Telecom companies are only concerned with profit. They should not be allowed to punish smaller websites and services that won't be able to pay the fees that the big companies will charge if these proposed rules go through. We must allow freedom of speech and equality to reign online as we do outside of the internet. Please don't push these rules through. Take a moment and listen to Congress.

It isn't just for me...Net Neutrality is for all people, regardless of social status & income...

—Brent Spencer, Long Beach, CA

So much that is wrong with the US today can be attributed to money. The Internet is just like the old telephone utilities and Internet providers should be treated as the common carriers they are. We don't want to start a "haves vs. have-nots" Internet, where the vast majority of users are relegated to slower Internet because no one can compete with the wealthiest of individuals and companies in this country. It's time for the FCC to do the right thing and reclassify these companies as the common carriers they are and should be.

—Madonna Starr, New York, NY

Don't let the big companies ruin the Internet for everybody else.

—Steve Stevenson, Chilliwack, allowing corporations free reign of the internet will hurt everyone. it will cripple innovation, restrict access and will give corporations no incentive to upgrade service, they can just create a new revenue stream. everyone loses except the isp's declare all ISP's as common carriers and keep a free and open internet for everyone to use

—Allan Carroll, Lake City, FL

Mega industries already have too much power!

—Henry Berkowitz, Sabinsville, PA

In today's modern world Internet service is an essential, and I am opposed to giving the giant telecoms control over the prioritization of Internet content. Internet access should be regulated as a utility as telephone service is. I understand that Internet providers need to be profitable, and that some Internet content is very bandwidth intensive and thus expensive to carry. However, the costs of carrying this content should fall on the end user. Those demanding more "Flow" through the Internet "pipeline" should be paying their ISP more than the low bandwidth user. The payment for Internet service should be just like paying for water: a fixed monthly fee for the connection and a minimum usage figure with additional charges for metered usage beyond that included in the fixed fee. The sites and/or services that the user requests through the Internet "pipeline" should not be subject to any control by the ISP. Finally, the issues in this Proceeding are those of people vs. corporate power. So many citizens hate government because their interests are almost always secondary to the interests of the corporate world. Please show us that the interests of the people are of significance by reclassifying Internet service as a utility.

—Thomas McKee, Cary, NC

The Internet is the last level playing field for all users. Having an equal playing field for commercial, private, and other uses allows people to freely connect, at the same speed, without having to pay extra to communicate with someone else.

—Paul A. Duarte, Rocky Hill, CT

The government "created" the internet for the commom good, not so corporations could make billions. They have grabbed so many air waves that first responders have difficulty communicating in an emergency, as with 9-11.

—Mrs. Kirk Fuss, Lakewood, CO

Net neutrality is essential to democracy.

—Imogen Taylor, Portland, OR its important that the small web site will be able to get their messages and product out for the public to veiw without restrictions.

—Elwood Gay, Providence, RI

Net neutrality is the reason the Internet has become the very thing it is today. With fast lanes and slow lanes internet will become unequal and different issues will be prioritized higher than other based on who pays the most. It might not be that information people want or like but it will be that information that people get because everything else isn't fast enough. That is unacceptable. The internet community was created by us, not big corpora or fascist governance in their hip pocket. The internet is the last device allowing a free and open conduit to real information not propaganda as mainstream media has become. You might be able to contain the rising that's happening for a few generations but eventually it'll be your undoing upon stifling humanity and the awakening.

I am already seeing slow internet access. I really don't want to see it any slower.....

—Ralph Glick, Florence, KY

A free Net is the most powerful check we have today against democracy-threatening corporate interests and government excesses.

—Leonard Brandriet, Concord, CA

Since internet has been introduced and available to most of the general public, why make it more difficult either due to cost or access. I'm not a big user but there are occasions where it's convenient to make contact with family, friends or do a bit of research. If the cost increases, my only option is to cancel use and I know of others in the same boat. Thanks.

Net neutrality could allow for ISPs to earn more money if they build better networks. Everyone can have what they want. This is indicative of the monopolisation that causes capitalism to fail.

—Christopher Hofman, ,

There must be some place/thing not corrupted by corporations on this planet.

—Geoff Cook, ,

The internet has become a primary tool for doing most business and is especially important for small businesses that don't have high volumes but count on speed. The impact to small business of large companies segmenting bandwidth would be extremely harmful to new businesses, new ideas that would be initiated on the web and to individuals that use the web in new and innovative ways.

—Robert Emery, Denver, CO

It's important that grass roots organizations, non-profits, small businesses not received downgraded service if they can't afford the "normal" service, or even be prevented from receiving service if the ISP doesn't like their message.

—Carlin R. Buchanan, Renton, WA

You all know that Net Neutrality is the right position to support.

—Charles Beaudoin, Oak Harbor, WA

I stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality. Thankyou, Greg Warwick

—Greg Warwick, ,

The internet is a tool for the spreading of human knowledge, and knowledge should be, and must be, free for all to access, view, refer to and critique. It is based on the basic human right of free speech, and the removal of net neutrality is the removal of human speech.

—Henrik Aareskjold, ,

Many websites pay their domain and server bills with advertisement revenue (google ads etc.) Some are profitable, but some barely break even. Additional fees would drive a large portion of these websites away. The Agencies that sponsor ads on these sites would lose profit, as would the companies whose ads are shown. On the internet, websites are the System. Adding costs to websites puts pressure on the system. A pressurized system is more volatile. A volatile system may explode if disturbed. If you're the one adding pressure to the system, then chances are that you're the one standing next to it when it goes "boom". Due to increased cost to their customers, the ISPs are unlikely to make much more--if any--money by adding premium charges and tolls. Some customers will accept the fees, whilst others will say "not gonna happen". Net balance: zero change. End result: every business that uses online marketing systems has you in their "bad books". Also, Google hates you.

I have many friends in the states, whom I can only contact through the use of the internet. We all share common sites and internet communities where we spend time together. If net neutrality is not upheld, that all could take a heavy blow. Furthermore, I think that net neutrality makes the internet a much better place in terms of open market and economy, than a slow lane model would.

—Michael Bley, ,

I don't even know why we have to send in theses messages. This shouldn't even be a thought on what the right thing to do is. Honestly we spend so much time debating the obviously right thing to do it makes us look like a bunch a fucking monkey arguing over bananas. Honestly just protect Net Neutrality. Just do it.

—Adam James Mildenberger, ,

The internet is a hotbed for innovation and experimentation. Any attempt to create different tiers of access will only serve to hobble the greatest source of human development we've ever created. Please preserve the precious possibilities built into the current system.

—Larry Goldfarb, Santa Cruz, CA

I reside in a rural area, where we have only one provider, the telephone company. Their slow DSL service is all we have, and we do not need continued greed and fighting to further impede our rather pathetic internet service

—Stephen D. Nichols, Yelm, WA

Schools will be the main sufferers. To create a fast lane they must steal bandwidth from the already slow lanes and make them even slower. Don't believe the lies. Keep serving corporations instead of the people and you will have a revolution on your hands.

—Kevin FitzMaurice, Portland, OR

If you destroy Net Neutrality, you are destroying our democracy. You must reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II because that is what they are. If only the rich can have free access to information, then we are no longer a democracy. Too many of you are selling out the people of this nation to cater to the power mad wealth hoarders who want to be kings and make us all peasants. That imbalance can't last. It can only lead to a total breakdown of society.

—Mary Rocco, Los Angeles, CA

The internet should be open and free for everyone to use. It should not be limited or doled out to the privileged. The internet has helped bring about the age of information. Let that continue to flourish so no more corruption or misdirection of the population can happen.

It's been a literal lifesaver. I was able to access information online that resulted in significantly improving a debilitating autoimmune condition for which my doctors said there was nothing they could do. If the websites provided by physicians who were successfully treating this condition via dietary changes and specific nutritional supplements were blocked or slowed down, I may not have accessed them nor the invaluable information they provided.

—William Roberson, Brooklyn, NY

I am 48 years old and live in Canada. I started my online experiences with BBS's when I was in High School. If it wasn't local and I had to dial in via long distance I had to pay. Then ISP's came along and it was a bit more expensive, but it was the internet. No more long distance. It wasn't perfect, but it works. If we as a planet have to start censoring everything for political correctness and or bandwidth then we are screwed, I have been paying a lot for my bandwidth the last 10 years and if I have to pay more because of a fight between companies, complete and total BS.

Big Telecom did not develop the internet; the American taxpayer did decades ago. Please do not let Big Telecom of OUR internet. Please support Net Neutrality.

—Sheffield Corey, Saunderstown, RI

Data is data. If providers are able to prioritize their own content over another provider's, there could be significantly fewer opportunities for smaller, independent providers to have their content heard. This would have significant impacts on innovation as well. Keep the net neutral!

—Steven Lapointe, ,

Freedom from gov interference !

—William George, ,

I dont want to anymore for my internet

—Ken Rhines, dighton, MA

In order for the internet to function effectively, all different sorts of data must be accorded the same priority; if telecommunications providers are allowed to place certain traffic in a slow lane, they will use this to extort grossly inflated fees from consumers and bias the internet in favour of their preferred content. In an age when so many ideas and transactions take place over the internet, this could have far-reaching consequences for society.

It enables me to use the computer and the internet without fear of unwanted advertisements and a slower speed to connect and move about the internet.

—Dennis Laurain, Troy, MI

Internet speed in the US is already slower than it is in Europe. Users like myself would be further disadvantaged if this slow lane/fast lane business is enacted. It would seem that the most reasonable action would be to reclassify the Internet as a utility. I am currently "retired" early do to illness/disability. If I am able to eventually work from home, having normal (I.e., not slow) internet speed would be crucial to my livelihood. Thank you.

As part of my work, I need to do research on the internet. Many times the topics I pursue are quite obscure. Trying to do this in a slow lane would be next to impossible.

—Patricia Elaine Mason, Mill Valley, CA

Net neutrality and open internet is important to me for several reasons. It's a creative outlet for many talented people who without it being an open environment, never would have an outlet to express their individuality. This day and age, we are forced to abide by boundaries set up by society. Supposed to eat a certain way, dress a certain way, live a certain lifestyle and what does that tell our youth? What is wrong with being a little outside the box? There is a reason, many people do not subscribe to cable services anymore and that's because much more accessible entertainment online. Like minds can congregate on sites of their interest. The best thing about it, is it's an open community, can communicate and browse whenever you want. There is not a lot of freedoms in this day and age, even internet itself isn't free, monthly charge with the service but bottling down or limiting that service is just going to affect one of the last good media outlets. Are we a dictatorship? No we're in democratic countries with rights being stripped away at every turn. Even sites that were once great are now media controlled and slowed down drastically. Youtube comes to mind personally but let us have this one.

Since it's beginning, the Internet has been free and available to all. It is wrong to give huge multi billion dollar companies the ability to essentially take over, have the fastest speed and make even more profit. The Internet should be regulated like other utilities.

—Susan Mueller, Carpinteria, CA

Keep the internet fair, free, and open. Big corporations don't need any more help.

—Mr. IraJacobs Jacobs, London, CA

—Peter Burgess, ,

There are dire ramifications in prioritizing, blocking or regulating the speed of Internet access, based upon monetary considerations and the unadulterated greed of the telecom companies. Net neutrality is vital and shouldn't become an arrangement controlled by the telecom industry. Content should never be prioritized and should remain readily and equally available to ALL.

A free and open internet is crucial to my work. I am a self-employed writer on economic and monetary topics, and travelling to the large libraries where the best resources are is in no way a serious option. The internet is what makes my job work. It not only enables my employment and research, but also allows me to take care of my children. Without a free and open internet, my life takes a giant step backwards. I know many other people who would be similarly affected. Mr. Wheeler, please establish Net Neutrality for the ages.

Respectfully, Hubert Walker

—Hubert Walker, Oak Ridge, TN

Internet today is equivalent to the land-line phone of yesterday. Then, we were not subject to signing up for 'slow' or 'high speed' phone. Why should we today in this modern age be forced to choose between 'slow' and 'high speed' lines especially given today's technology and economies of scale that can be realized? Let's hope you are able to set aside the 'greed' factor and all can enjoy the marvels of today's technology equally. pm

—Pat Morin, ,

We need equal access for all users, no matter the content. We all need to have the same opportunities to reach people on the internet. This is a public utility and should be managed with the public in mind.

—Vicki Riske, Mesa, AZ

It's fair. Without it only the rich and greedy have the advantages.

—Cathy Delorme, Lafayette, LA

I have experienced slow dial-up speed and It was so frustrating. I want to participate in online health services in the future and it is fast broadband that will make this possible. Your plan would make me a second class citizen.

—Sally Curry, ,

The internet, today, is the most important tool we have towards achieving important and lasting social, environmental, and ethical change in the world - we need it to be fast and accesible, for as many people as possible. Education via the internet is a key component of saving the planet, and ourselves... let us do what we can to encourage this.

—Ryan Moore, ,

It is important that the internet be a level playing field. I think it is a terrible idea for the common good that the telecom companies could charge more for some people than others, and thus end the free flow of ideas and information on the internet. Please do not allow the telecom companies to charge for premium access!

—Cheryl A Moore, Mosier, OR

I believe real Net Neutrality is essential for our democracy and our capacity to compete!

—Theodore Wilcox, Rochester, NY

Simple, it may be the last bastion for truly FREE SPEECH in American, if not the world, and WE MUST NOT LOSE THAT FREEDOM as we are losing so many of our other freedoms bit by bit to wealthy special interest monopolies! Please stand by our few remaining Constitutional and civil rights!!

NET NEUTRALITY!!!!

—Charles Murray, Fredericksburg, VA

It will prevent the carriers from forcing their own ideals and censoring content they may not approve of even though other people may believe in said content and wish to access. (Example) Bell doesn't even carry our local station and has never carried it. If they did, I would probably have to pay a premium. It will also prevent them from monopolizing service access as well through their various licensing chemes. They already have ownership over major television networks(they promote heavily) which they shouldn't have been allowed to have in the first place... I will be on the verge of cancelling everything cable TV & internet access) if the costs for service continue to rise.

The Government has its fingers into too many pies. Between constant surveillance, unreasonable access fees, bandwidth caps (lack of control of monopolistic ISPs) , et cetera, they are effectively destroying the last bastion of truly free expression there is. But that's the plan, isn't it?

—Jason Handley, ,

as a game designer, net neutrality is important to me

—Matthew Surdej, Goldens Bridge, NY

Today, the most basic information and services are delivered digitally; common carriage is the only sensible and just answer.

—Katie Levine, San Francisco, CA

The basis of human equality is equality of opportunity. This certainly applies to freedom of expression. This will be severely limited if internet access speed is only made to people on the basis of their wealth. Where the children of poorer families are thus affected, it will begin to effect educational opportunities and inculcate disadvantage.

—Pat Drummond, ,

People deserve to know truths.

—Jim Fritz, Grandville, MI

Free speech is a right of The People, not exclusive to The Rich and Powerful. Net Neutrality is essential to maintaining this right, and by extension, Democracy itself. You know this. You know very well that if you allow those Powers to buy a Fast Lane, they will abuse that power and suppress web content that is not in their interest. You know this. The Internet IS in fact a Public Utility, and this fact needs to be codified into law, and the broadband providers must be classified as Common Carriers, regardless of their promises and threats. Do the right thing! Thank you.

Free speech happens on the internet whereby ALL parties & individuals can have their voices heard. I cannot be heard on the TV or the radio as I have no money to pay for it whereas the billionaires & millionaires can spend very little (proportionally to their incomes) to flood the airwaves of the US with their ideologies, candidates, & outright propaganda. The future of mankind depends on information

—Marco Bos, ,

For the internet to work and be as democratic as possible it is important that costs are kept low for ordinary users.

—Mandy Coghill, ,

Corporations already get plenty of ludicrous tax breaks while the rest of the public pay for it. They don't need a super highway internet lane where they can monopolize the cost and speed everyone receives. That is NOT how a democracy works. Keep it open and free for everyone, just like our country was founded on: freedom and equality for all.

—Jennifer Toth, Santa Clarita, CA

Some individuals (like myself, a minister & spiritual counselor) & some small groups need to have unimpeded access to the Internet. Some of us Help people, and some rely on the internet for their small business. I already have to overpay for the connection I have ($70 a month for a 4MG speed). We need the FCC to reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers". Thank you in advance for Doing the Right Thing!

—Reverend Kevin Howard, Celina, TN

This internet has to continue to be free and for it to be free for expression too. Business, communication and everything that is dependent on our lives is for the internet as we understand it. Don't be power hungry.

Because I prefer freedom and human rights to having my options and choices dictated by big business, in a world where wealth is more important than the right to freely communicate. The minority of plutocrats who have achieved wealth and power by exploiting the ordinary, the poor the weak cannot be allowed to control the majority, and set aside centuries of slowly gathered rights and freedoms. American and the UK both loudly trumpet their role as defenders of freedom, prove that this is so by preserving net neutrality.
—Nicholas Dove, Wendens Ambo, NY

Corporations control pretty much everything around the world, including governments, so non-corporate entities – i.e., individuals, artists, small businesses, et. al. – need at least one resource and communications platform upon which they can compete on a level playing field, including, of course, equitable costs of entry and usage.
—Robert Kennedy, ,

Net Neutrality is the only way for a man of my injuries can interact with the outside world. Please don't take that away.
—Anthony Miller, Tulsa, OK

Everyone should have the same access to the internet.
—Carol Schultz, ,

The internet should be available to everyone with no exceptions. There's only one way to save Net Neutrality: The FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers."
—Paul Martin, Danvers, MA

No one anywhere in the world owns the internet. There for stop trying to control it . This is a freedom! !

—Mike Yeo, ,

You old fucks will die soon anyways, why does it matter to you ?

—Hakim Hassan-Sabourin, ,

The Internet should be freely available for everyone

—Phil Bender, ,

I already continuously spend money to increase the speed of my family's electronic needs. It is already frustrating when higher security, newer program requirements, and heavier virus protection continuously slows down these machines. Now if sites are purposefully slowed down, why would people ever need to purchase newer faster equipment? Allowing the ISPS to dictate the speeds to different sites that they choose seems a really unfair to endusers like myself and developers of sites who have put in countless dollars and time and innovation to increase speed.

—Gary Burke, ,

Net Neutrality is the domain of the citizens of these United States. FCC privileging any other entity is an egregious violation and discounting of the source from which all action find legitimacy – its citizens.

—Stephen Dvorak, Mountain View, CA

Please don't undermine the neutrality we depend on so much for work.

—Tomas Butchart, Albuquerque, NM

The internet needs to be available to everyone, not just rich and powerful interests who can afford to pay big fees.

—Julie Armes, ,

The internet has been created and sustained by the joint cooperation of universities and government and private corporations, and it has brought great benefit to all of us. Concentrating the power to decide who most benefits from it into the hands of just a few large corporations will only serve to limit those benefits. Please strongly consider reclassifying ISPs as common carriers. Thank you.

—Matthew Krueger, Plymouth, MA

The internet is vital to my business as an English tutor. It is also essential to my husband as a teacher. Finally, the internet is important to my children as students. I urge you to reclassify this essential tool as an utility!

—Melanie Roth, Danvers, MA

The Internet is the great equalizer of our times. Please don't take that away from us.

—Mr. Nate Wynd, Columbus, OH

I want the ability to get information that is legal to have that is not necessarily approved of by powers with more money than I have.

—Gary Grice, Chicago, IL

Any form of censorship or favouritism towards individual use of the internet is divisive and a breach of human rights.

—Dee Roye, Cromer,

Please support internet users and not the providers. Society will be better served with a fast and open internet that benefits everyone.

—Eric Watson, ,

It is vital to free expression and the future of society and technology that the flow of information isn't strangled by entities who are concerned more with the short-sighted profits of today rather than the long-term progress of humanity. It's been proven time and again that, without regulation in place to prevent it, large organizations tend not only to take but also ABUSE every advantage given. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

—Ben Luten, Scott City, MO

You have been gouging the public for far too many years. Now you are trying to gouge even more. Even as a corporation or whatever what can you do with more money? nothing. The general public can feed their families with what little money they have.

—Kathy Joyce, ,

Real freedom must not be sacrificed on the altar of artificial scarcity. ISPs are Utilities, and none of their claims of doom and gloom to justify their opposition to Net Neutrality are founded on the empirical basis. The Internet has always done fine before the ISP's protestations, and will continue to do as after Net Neutrality is implemented. ISPs are Utilities!

—Olivier Drolet, ,

The net was given to all and should remain for all, not just for those with the biggest wallets

—Barry McMillan, ,

The establishment of a strong legal basis for protecting against discriminatory throttling of the traffic of edge providers is an essential need to keep the US competitive on the global stage in the next century. NARUC's General Counsel was correct when he stated that broadband service meets every criteria of Title II, and belongs under Title II. I strongly urge the commissioners to support reclassification and end the uncertainty faced at the state level due to the unclear status of internet services.

—William Joyce, Boston, MA

The net is for everyone equally. The American PEOPLE have been pushed far enough! !!!!!!!!!!!

—Billy Baker, Baltimore, MD

Keep the internet free from tampering by multi-nationals whose only interest is profit.

—Robert Weston, ,

Keeping the net as an even playing field for all is important to me

—Robert DeForest, ,

1. No more net neutrality means ISPs can discriminate against content they dislike. 2. No more net neutrality means ISPs can force websites to PAY for faster content delivery. 3. Destroying net neutrality is bad for small businesses. 4. Without net neutrality, entire types of online traffic (like Netflix) may be in jeopardy. 5. Without net neutrality, ISPs can make even more money without actually improving the Internet. 6. No more net neutrality means censorship. I urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers (because that's what they are) under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality Anything less is unacceptable.

—John Petty, New Windsor, MD

It evens the playing field for all rich or poor.

—Charlotte Slater-Lunsford, Lancaster, CA

we must have net neutrality or the internet will never be the same and freedom of expression will be over.

—Susan Leber, Brooklyn, NY

If I have to tell you why, you don't get it anyway

—David Guy, ,

All content on the Internet should be available at the same speed, regardless of how wealthy the publisher is.

—Peter Trueman, ,

Net Neutrality is necessary for maintaining a free and open internet and in promoting innovation by allowing new companies and ideas the opportunity to reach the same web audience as established websites and larger corporate owned internet services.

—Colin Bowes, Miami Beach, FL

Net Neutrality is the single most important concept in modern times when it comes to competitive internet prices, internet censorship and big companies taking advantage of throttling internet for small business and the everyday customer. Take action and open your eyes to the devastation that will cause if net neutrality falls and big corporations have complete control of the internet.

—Joaquin Gonzalez, Spring Hill, FL

For giving the everyone the same power to reach potential viewers as everyone else. This has provided a platform for many voices to be heard! Let's keep it that way - it seems as American as apple pie...

—Justin Jones, Brooklyn, NY

It belongs to everyone.

Progress is not made by the powerful few, but by the educated population of societies around the globe. Today, Internet is the biggest source of knowledge, and therefore we cannot let anyone exploit their powers to control even parts of it.

—Kjetil Nyjordet, ,

I love the internet. Don't ruin it.

—Lauren, ,

I am a regular internet user and the common carriage policy is important to me because I understand the benefits of a "level playing field" internet. I oppose the FCC's proposal because I believe it threatens my freedom of speech and expression in the internet age. Please consider the legal implications of such a proposal. Thanks. (E. Anderson)

—Eric Anderson, Camp Hill, PA

You know why its important. This counts.

—Rebecca Aguilar, Dallas, TX

The net is a public place much like a park or market. Keeping it free and open is in the interest of the majority locking it up and charging is in the interest of the few.

—Ryan ellis, ,

We need a level playing field for all ideas, not just for those who can pay to play.

—Jose Blanco, Miami, FL

The internet should be kept free for everyone.

—Carl Estes, Boulder Creek, CA

The Internet is a basic utility in our lives now. There is no legitimate reason to manipulate our access for greater profit. We need Net neutrality, as well, for open access to all that is available on the internet.

—Angela Stertz, Dublin, OH

Open Internet is important to my sense of freedom and non-interference.

—Patricia Rovik, ,

People like me who can't afford to pay the prices for the kind of internet this would cause would be out of reach for us

I shouldn't have to tell you. Are there any Engineers in Congress? What about Tech entrepreneurs? No, mostly lawyers. Case in point.

—Costa Michailidis, Whitestone, NY

Because I'm sick and tired of having corporations taking our right to free access away just to make more money

—Christopher King, ,

Technological innovation needs Free Markets to work. Free Markets bring technological innovation. Closing the flow of information by allowing large corporations to choose who has access will kill the development that has gotten us this far.

—Robert Mick, Austin, TX

Net Neutrality is every citizen's right that cannot be taken away by corporate lobby groups. It is your job to ensure that this right is protected. Do the RIGHT thing by saying NO to Big Telecom's desire to control our internet. Thank-you.

Please reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers" and save Net Neutrality for the millions of us that work in service to humanity by contributing to the world wide web, and would be forced to cease if we had to pay huge fees.

I want low cost internet access for everyone!

—Patricia Tourangeau, Troy, VA

Equal Speeds for all consumers/content/keep price affordable for simple access!!

—Steph Kempner, Chicago, IL

I have not yet been able to upgrade from dial-up service - but I hope to be able to afford to within the next year. In the meantime, I spend more money on bills (many provide incentives to pay online), and spend way too much time filling out medical forms that I used to fill out in-office, but are now 'conveniently' offered only online. I want speed, I want to pay for speed, and I'll be there budget-wise within a year. The absolute LAST thing I want to find when I get there is that I've worked hard for something I've "admired from afar" that no longer exists! Having dial-up is a great way to really feel the dramatic change in how real-world activities that used to occupy a lot of time and a noticeable amount of cash - like, for stamps every month - are now frustrating, time-consuming chores - if they're even available. I feel my dependance on the internet far more strongly, I think, than those who can currently accomplish in thirty seconds what may take me twenty or more minutes - the familiarity/invisibility link. Believe me, if I could drive down to pick up forms and fill them out longhand instead of waiting and waiting for pages to load, I absolutely would! But I can't, and that's my whole point. Some essential services are now either only available online, or more expensive real-world, or both. Please protect the access of all of us to our utility bills, kids' school information, medical charts/forms, and even cat videos - which I haven't yet seen due to 56K limitations. Please don't let my first one on high-speed take forever to load and play all choppy, just so Comcast, et al, can make a few extra bucks ... while I go buy more stamps because of their desire to cut service in pursuit of profit. Thank you for reading. Sincerely, G D Abbott

A level playing field for everyone.

—Barbara Neri, Pinckney, MI

Protecting net neutrality is protecting democracy. Ending net neutrality is ending democracy. Please be wise.

—P C, Austin, TX

equal access to information for all Americans (rather than income based access) freedom of speech freedom of activism access to online education Americans already pay for speed allowing telecoms to charge content providers is just a loophole for them to charge consumers double for what they already pay for - Americans already pay for download/upload speeds - by charging content provider the double fee instead of consumers; by doing so they also create inequality to access content. The only right thing to do for America is protect net neutrality.

—TI, Newhall, CA

Net neutrality keeps the bandwidth usage fair for everyone. Big telecom doesn't own the internet, they only own the infrastructure it's built on. Therefore, all they need to worry about is keeping the infrastructure up to date and there won't be issues with network bandwidth

—Cody Noteboom, Marcola, OR

We need a democratic web!

—William OBrien, Beaverton, OR

The Internet is now the last remaining true frontier of exploration and innovation for most of the world. To limit certain users/domains to a slow lane simply because they can't afford the dues/fees that big corporations can, undermines the true spirit of the American Dream and the very nature of capitalism, upon which that dream is based. To me this is akin to the Mafia extorting protection fees from store owners, to ensure that their businesses "stay safe".

—Andrew Ross, ,

One of the freedoms left.

—Claude, ,

Big telecom needs to solve its bandwidth issues another way - not by creating favored status for those who have the means to bribe them for speed.

—Bert Leysath, Gloucester, MA

I am an elderly pensioner and the internet is my main connection to the world. I feel that I have the right to connect with others through it openly and freely without having to pay any extra high costs to do so.

—Marcia Mary Southwell, ,

It is not up to the big corporations to tell the people what to do and how to live. It should be the other way around. Give that power back to the people espically since you've been elected by the people.

—Alexandre Dumontet, ,

Net Neutrality is essential for artists and small businesses. I have many friends who run both, and having the ability to sell one's wares or services online and compete in an open marketplace, as they do, is still a backbone of an IT economy. Further, IT innovation was built by net neutrality, not by blocking and slowing people based on additional set of high-pay barriers. Not only has Net Neutrality benefitted individuals and corporations economically, but it has had a profound effect on communities in terms of problem-solving, the sharing of resources and expertise, and the provision of platforms for people to seek the urgent help and advice they need on a wide range of topics from coping with mental illness, how queer youth can survive bullying, to how to find doctors educated about one's particular disability, to action and education against racism, etc. Net Neutrality should apply strongly to the internet, and therefore the FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers." This is not only an issue of freedom of speech, but an issue of economic urgency, and of community life and health!

—Nadine Wettlaufer, ,

It's just common sense.

—Rob Sutherland, ,

Net neutrality guarantees freedom of speech and equality of access to opportunity for all people, regardless of means. Preferred carriage is profoundly inimical

—Simon Sonter, ,

Abandoning Common Carriage for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power.

—Frank Gorry, ,

Net Neutrality is the way internet always should be: not tampered with. No site deserves more priority than one another and everyone deserves an open internet without any limitations on speeds. Net Neutrality is also important to maintain an uncensored environment that is free to innovate into. Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II.

—Gabriel Blais-Duchesne, ,

Support net neutrality. It is fair & just. Access should not depend on how much money you have.

—Geri McGillicuddy, Aptos, CA

The last thing I, as a consumer, need is to have the top 1% deciding how the internet service should be made available to the rest of us.

—Darrell Schmidt, Rose Hill, KS

You all are sold to big corporations, leave the net alone and go die somewhere. Hope you all burn in hell

—Julien Guévremont, ,

The internet is the most important communication tool on the planet. It has changed the way we work, think, organize ourselves. It must NEVER be allowed to be commercialized so that some users have privileges which others do not share.

—Andrew Oliver, ,

I have not heard one media tv network mention net neutrality in the news, so how would people know about this without the internet availability we now have?

—David Breed, Tucson, AZ

Freedom of speech is not to be cut into pieces and sold.

—Scott Mewborn, De Kalb, TX

It's the ONLY equitable way.

—Steven N., ashburn, VA

We Must keep out of people's inboxes and browsers. Privacy is paramount. We take that away and the internet would crumble under the uncertainty of same lack of security.

It is important because the Internet is something that is bigger than any one person or nation and it should not be corralled.

—Andrew Macas, Oak Lawn, IL

Information must be accessible

—Revelly Robinson, ,

Free speech should not be bought and sold. The proposal to grant ISPs the right to charge for 'fast lanes' threatens this celebrated American principle. The company that connects us to the internet should not get to manipulate or control what we do on the internet. I'm calling on you to reclassify the Internet as a telecommunications service to obligate ISPs to deliver all data on the Internet without discrimination. Please do the right thing: let corporations know that the Internet is not for sale to the highest bidder. Thank you for preserving a free and open Internet.

—Virginia Ciaramitaro, Roseville, MI

Separate and Unequal is Unconstitutional!

—Sofia G. Quinones, Los Angeles, CA

The internet is a virtual space that crosses borders and provides the potential for giving all an equal voice. This is best achieved if we all have the same means and access to the same quality of internet

—Blaine West, ,

Net neutrality is important to me because, if I have to "pay to play" I will not be able to afford to use the internet, and that would trample upon my right to both free expression and my right to a free and open press. Please reclassify broadband as a public utility. Thank you.

—Heather Reynolds, Long Beach, CA everyone needs to have a chance at reasonable speed without spending big bucks to get it.

—James Hood, Kite, GA

The internet is the most powerful tool of our time. It is reshaping commerce, politics, scientific research, human rights and social justice campaigns. It is important to ensure that access is available to all citizens, regardless of political bent or economic status. ISP corporations are just that, corporations, and their stated purpose is profit and growth, not freedom or justice. To allow these companies to hijack the internet and shape it's future is no different than turning it over to the whims of a totalitarian regime, with results similar to the situation in China, or the radical Middle East states. It is in the most desperate corners of the planet that the internet has brought hope, change and justice, like bombs and bullets have failed to do. We in the west must step up to the plate and protect this precious resource from narrow interests, or else abandon the pretense of democracy altogether.

—Michal Rollauer, ,

The internet was built to allow for the spread of ideas, communications, and transactions. Net Neutrality helps protect these core concepts that define the internet.

—Samuel Klein, Glassboro, NJ

With the consolidation of the press into the hands of the very rich, the internet is the last bastion of American free speech. Protecting net neutrality should be the FCC's primary concern, in order to keep America free. Without free and equal access to any site, we allow corporations to make financial criteria the determining factor in what Americans can access over the internet. Please support net neutrality to support the right of Americans to free access to all information, not just paid content.

—Anastasia Nicole, Pleasant Hill, CA

—Andrew Thompson, Watertown, MA

Non Net Neutrality is equivalent to charging for the air everyone breaths. I'm sure cable providers would charge for air if the law allowed.

—Ed Prout, Loveland, CO

Net neutrality is important to everyone because it is how we communicate and share our lives now. Technology is important but it is also neutral. It can be good, or it can be bad. It is what people make of it. One of the things you are going to have to realize as a government but in the context of this discussion is that technology if abused has some extremely bad uses and if you don't let people share their ideas the only ones sharing ideas will be people like you!. All the bad ones. Nukes are not good ideas my little friends. So let's use this technology for good. Solving world problems, sharing information, and being our selves was part of why it was built. Let them share. The worst that will happen is we'll have a better world. Maybe you don't want that, but your children, and my children do. I think it's time we stop being so selfish. Long term it will take at least 30 years to get off the current trends as is. Yeah let's shut They're computers off too? LOOK, we can turn left? Or we can turn right. Don't screw this up.

We do not need the Internet to follow Canada's high cell phone style !!!

—Lawrence Hughes, ,

Net Neutrality has given us inconceivable amounts of innovation in an impossibly short time. Every large web based company could not have existed if not for Net Neutrality. Technology like smart phones could never have existed without net neutrality as the apps developed would not be on a level playing field. Innovation and technology would be absolutely stone walked on a WORLD SCALE if providers are allowed to create a two tier system so they can get more money. This is unacceptable and a setback for humankind.

—Miss Rebecca Wang, Berkeley, CA

Any "improvement " that you make is sure to cost us more.

I am a Veteran, Active Voter and TaxPayer. As a Veteran I put my life on the line for Democracy. Please help stop the plutocratic take over and save American Democracy and the middle class. I use the internet to find coupons to use at my local stores. The coupons help me to purchase more food than I could without them. I use the internet to find the best prices on other items I need. I use the internet to find real news. Modern day newscasts are more for entertainment than about what is actually happening in the World today. I use the internet for political news and to find out about the people that are running for office. The internet is a tool that I use to survive in these difficult times. Please reclassify the internet as a Public Utility so it will remain a useful tool for all of us. I paid into SS from 1962 until I was forced to retire in 2010. Any retirement savings I had were wiped out by Wall Street. The $1218. I receive from SS monthly pays my rent and utilities. I have 2 paper routes to pay for food and other necessities. What happens when I'm no longer able to do the routes?? I have a 1989 automobile. If it breaks down and I can't repair it I lose the routes because I do not have enough income to secure a loan for a new vehicle. What ever happened to Respect for the Elderly??? I say again, the internet is a tool that I use to survive in these difficult times. Please reclassify the internet as a Public Utility so it will remain a useful tool for all of us.

Why should big companies make a profit from something that is already free? When does the middle class finally get something?

—Mr. Kenneth Mayer, Wappingers Falls, NY

The press has always been the fourth branch of the government, but newspapers are dying, and TV is so biased as to make it meaningless. The Internet is the only way we can have FREE Press, free of big business. The internet is all there is between democracy and oligarchy. Keep net neutrality!

Big should not mean all powerful.

—Tom Brink, York, NE

A free and open internet is the major means of free speech and open access to information and communication world-wide. The entire idea of allowing corporations to destroy free and open access for their corporate profit is nothing less than shocking. Chairman Wheeler, I have been a university librarian for 20 years and an online librarian for 15, answering questions through an online internet Ask a Librarian service that serves thousands of libraries and patrons across the U.S. and world, and I know that students and people of all ages and needs depend on and need open, free and unimpeded access to useful and necessary knowledge and information. Net Neutrality is what makes the internet so special. The fact that everyone is treated equally on it is like nothing else in the world. It is only because everyone can be successful online that it has become such an integral part of our lives. Destroying Net Neutrality and allowing carriers to charge for premium access will destroy the internet and stifle innovation. Your decision will also affect people outside of the US, as lots of internet traffic coming from outside the country goes through US servers. As a newspaper reporter, I covered the Connecticut regulators of telephone service. I have never understood why Internet service should be any less a common carrier than phone lines. Coming into my home it's the same line.

—Don O. Noel, Hartford, CT

I want a free internet

—Alex Munguia, Daly City, CA

keep it simple and accessible.

—Erline Towner, Milford, NH

It should be about equal access for all- for me as well as for those who can pay much, much more to offer their vastly faster services simply BECAUSE they can pay for it [the reverse being that sites could be blocked if those paying don't like certain things...]. The internet should be a "Common Carrier", equal for all and regulated for all...

—Russ Holzer, altoona, PA

The Internet is for everyone to freely use as desired.

—F Mulcahy, ,

I use the internet every day and cannot afford price increases

—Mary Ann Ferentz, Scranton, PA

I want a free flow of information. I want people to have the ability to share there opinions about what is happening globally and locally. Only a dictator or communist would be against net neutrality.

—Tyler Sandiford, ,

Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Paul Birkbeck, ,

Corporations are not people, neither are large groups or small wealthy groups. It was individual rights this country was based on. We all should have EQUAL access!

—Tommie Clendening, Livingston, TX

It's about time someone pays attention to President Eisenhower's warning about big business/bug military. Quit giving a few multi-billionaire companies all the power over not only the common people but also the politicians and bureaucrats.

—James Shott, Akron, OH

I live in a rural service area. I delayed upgrading from a dial-up connection for years due to the expense. To pay for an ADSL and then have my connections selectively throttled back to an unusable speed is just plain wrong. Also, where is the emphasis on establishing high-speed access throughout rural/underserved areas if we do not continue common carriage? And are state and municipal governments who have laid out the taxpayers' cash for infrastructure to this point now expected to absorb additional access fees? The municipal networks become white elephants! Some will never even be built. Taxpayers and private ratepayers alike who have paid for the existing infrastructure will have their equity stripped and handed to a minority. That is the very antithesis of a free and open internet. This has got to be about what is good for all members of our society, not what is good for a greedy and opportunistic few. We must not ransom our collectively earned benefits. Your agency can restore them with a simple determination. Please reclassify broadband providers as discussed above in the main body of this petition.

—Paul F. Schuman, Glenville, NY

Making cable and telecom companies even more powerful is something only greedy politicians would do. You are directly putting us behind in the technology world if this goes through.

—Brian Hillman, Warrington, PA

Net Neutrality embodies the spirit of the Internet. Removing it necessarily jeopardizes the potential of the Internet. Additionally, Net Neutrality is consistent with the United States of America's international image. Removing it would tarnish this image.

—Robin Perrin, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me because those who cannot afford premium access will be forced into the internet slow lane.

—Earleen Dover, ,

Internet must have Neutrality to share and produce ideas. If you cut the flow of this river, it will affect the knowledge of the world, as well as the economy because the only space for progress and wealth would be taken away by the monopolies of the entertainment industry. Internet is not just entertainment, is also a tool to have solutions, share how we feel by a song, a book, or any idea. Don't take us to a dark era of limited knowledge. We don't want to be in the Middle Ages again.

—Eduardo Eduardo Hernandez Hernandez, Mexico,

I want my granddaughter to have the same access to the internet as I now do because I believe corporate ability to pay steep tolls will mean our grandchildren will not be living in a democracy.

—Pat, Charlotte, NC

As a person of faith, I need to be able to speak out for justice for vulnerable brothers and sisters, voiceless creatures, and the earth itself As a aperson of limited financial means, and a partially sighted person, I need to be able to do that from my own home. do not take away this ability by putting the internet in control of big corporations.

—Troy Faith Ward, Bellingham, WA

I've never had net neutrality. Living in a rural area has doomed me to dialup. Why isn't the net considered just as telephone to be a common nessesity open to all at an equal and fair price and speed. Shame on you greedy bastards!!!! Our time will come.

—Mr. Doug Beggs, Mississauga, ON

I want to make my own decisions about what I access on the Net - not somebody deciding for me!

—Jean Hart, Columbus, NC

The open Internet has historically been a place of freedom of expression and free speech. To go ahead with what your Telecom pets are proposing would effectively neuter most grassroots political movements around the world. I urge you to reconsider, as this will only drive such movements into the darknets and create uncontrollable civil unrest in many corners of the world, including here at home in the USA. Thank you.

—Pablo Ziggy, Walnutport, PA

In the long term, only net neutrality guarantees common access for everyone to information and free speech over the internet.

—Christoph Franzen, ,

You do not want to be in the slow lane I want to be in the fast lane

—Mike ORDAZ, Costa Mesa, CA

Net Neutrality will help small businesses get their services out to the local population through means of the internet. If Net Neutrality is lost, then small businesses that can't afford the fee will drop off the internet, this will hurt small business, the backbone of our country. Also the loss of Net Neutrality will allow the Government to completely monitor everything, and invade personal privacy to the fullest extent through the internet. This is breaking a citizen's basic Constitutional right.

—Dennis Wilson, Hampton, VA

We do not live in a totalitarian society. Corps. Need to stop trying to make it one.

—Peter Owen, ,

A fair playing field for ideas and innovation is what's needed in any society. Just because big business is big doesn't mean that it has the right to destroy future competition.

—Chris, ,

You don't own the internet, leave it alone. Stop bullying people so that you can get more money. The people you prey on, may even be your employees, who will then despise you even more. You are inviting internal trouble if you do this. That is how humans react. Think about the consequences of your actions. Amateur radio will come back etc.

—Christine Glennie, ,

Everybody needs a level playing field.

—Richard Keefe, Chardon, OH

Equal access means equal opportunity. There is enough of a class divide in this world already that we don't need to add to the disparity and to the burdens of the less fortunate and struggling.

—Angelis Dania, ,

An open Internet has allowed for advances in technology that would not have been possible otherwise (Netflix and Spotify come to mind.) These new services have allowed lesser known artists to get their name out to consumers who would never have had the chance to hear about them before the Internet. The move to make content providers such as Netflix pay more to have their service not slowed down is detrimental to consumer rights and fair competition. Furthermore, the FCC's language about Internet speeds is extremely misleading. The so-called "fast lanes" aren't really fast lanes at all since the maximum internet speed is dictated by infrastructure that ISPs seem unwilling to upgrade. The removal of net neutrality won't make anything faster, it will make certain that content that ISPs don't want distributed will run slower.

—Scott Augusta, ,

Access to internet services is essential for a strong economy. We must assure the masses that their internet access is as equal as our other rights and not dominated by one group.

—Phil Parks, Pearland, TX

Why are we ripped off enough. Why does cost rise when service declines???

—Michael McLean, ,

We, the U.S. taxpayers, financed the internet. We should benefit; large corporations should not profit at our expense.

—Sherry Vatter, Los Angeles, CA

All I ask is equality.

—James M. Tandoo, Edmonds, WA

Net neutrality is important, it provides a level playing field to encourage innovation and allows poorer nations equal access.

—Tom Gledhill, Auckland,

Do not artificially restrict internet access. This won't be a democracy thing!

—Alexander Umanets, ,

The internet is the last bastion of freedom. Governments have screwed up every other form of it so its probably a good idea to stay out of, and off the nets. It works fine the way it is.

—Adam Lamon, Deville, LA

Because neutral is fairest. If there are extra costs incurred, then let ISPs and network providers cover those costs from the billions in profit which they make, and not simply keep squeezing the consumer dry.

—Alan Ansell, ,

freedom

—Stephen Hunsberger, Nashville, TN

Tom Wheeler says, "Trust me, I believe in Net Neutrality." I tend to believe him, but when greedy corporations put pressure on congress, what Tom Wheeler believes can go out the window. Net Neutrality is important to me because I like the way it has been managed so far. It has been easy to get online and research, read, learn things, communicate with friends and at a cheap or reasonable price. I want my young son to have cheap and easy access so he can learn what he needs to learn online while he's in school. I can't afford to pay more to Verizon, who has an expensive monopoly in my isolated community. I don't want greedy corporations to take up most of the bands instead of compressing and optimizing as they should with their portion. Let's keep the Net reasonable and open so less wealthy people can start up companies and do some of the magic that has been done in the past with the Internet.

—Simone Meeker, Helendale, CA

Freedom and equality for everyone are important to me, not more power for the rich and the rich corporations.

—Sara McCay, Kamuela, HI

Net Neutrality is important in order to curtain corporate dictatorial ruler ship.

—Christy Wilkinson, Simpsonville, SC

The Internet is more important than telephone lines for ALL kinds of communication. Please consider it a PUBLIC UTILITY!

—Joan Chryst, Powell, OH

I do not want to see big business totally control the internet, which works well the way it is. I want low cost to ensure the majority of people can access the internet.

—M Hawkins, ,

No more corporate rule in these United States, You are supposed to fight for the people not some shitty corporations.

—Robert Brenon, Wilson, NY

The internet must remain a level playing field, thank you.

It is the citizens' communication system. That simple. Don't mess with your voters. They might bite....!

—Philip Reid, Klamath Falls, OR

It is my Constitutional right.

—LJ Orszulak, Chicopee, MA

I am sick to the soul of this draconian control. Who the hell gives you the right to take over what has been created by many for the benefit of the people. Net neutrality is hand and hand with freedom of expression A democratic right being eroded by big short sighted companies. Stop screwing the people.

—Arteshar Lloyd, ,

The Internet is my entire life - my job, my friends, and everything else. Slow lanes, essentially, are a direct threat for me to either pay a premium for my life or be blocked from it.

—Patchouli Knowledge, ,

As old copper phone lines are replaced by data-carrying fiber, and voice and data blend, we need the Common Carrier protections that were essential to phones to be applied to data (internet). Listen to the people of America, not the lobbyists of AT&T, Comcast, and Verizon. Remember that the government should be, in the words of Lincoln, "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

—Wesley Davis, Conyers, GA

The internet seems to be one of the few truly democratic places remaining; where start-ups can compete with giant retailers and self-published writers can have their e-books side-by-side with best sellers.

—Edwin Hicken, , on so many levels, net neutrality needs to happen. let's close the digital divide not increase it!

—Brenda Bryant, San Francisco, CA

my small business needs the same advantages as the big competition. They don't need any more advantages to crush us.

—Don Posh, Spooner, WI

Because I pay for the most powerful phone on the market and the top tier everything data plan with one of the three major carriers, yet the hazelnut farmer in Latvia has better, faster internet than I do.

—Stuart Thompson, Grapevine, TX

I run two small businesses that rely on online access.

—Leonard Lang, Minneapolis, MN

Currently websites compete based on what they're offering, removing Net Neutrality means that the sites have to compete based on how much they're willing to pay. This fosters the big sites getting bigger and the destruction of the small site and small business.

—Kieran McGee, ,

Net neutrality is essential for a free, open Internet. Without it freedom is lost in exchange for corporate profit and control.

—Trevor Mcnaught, ,

I don't want communications in this country to be controlled by corporate interests.

FREEDOM!

—Terry Helens Brough Merseyside, WA11 7DP (UCATT), ,

I use the internet every day, along with millions of others who comprise the 99%--why give the 1% yet another advantage over us? This is another example of the oligarchy we are turning into. Please maintain net neutrality!

—, New York, NY

The US is at the center of technological innovation when it comes to the internet, but this innovation is already being stifled by monopolies of ISPs. Destroying Net neutrality would destroy the United States place in the world of tomorrow.

—Liam Silverwood, ,

It's very important that all people have equal access to everything the internet has to offer - not just to what large, well-funded corporations want to make available to us. Please support the people, innovation, the economy and small business by making a truly neutral internet by simply reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers. This is for the future. It's the right thing to do. Thank you so much.

—Elaine Mathiason, ,

The Internet is a valuable tool in today's digital world. I must be free to all and made part of the commons.

—Joyce Niksic, Hammond, IN

The voice of the people, average Americans, must be heard. I think it's called representative democracy.

—Mr. William Thomas, Auburn, NH

Everyone deserves to use the internet to research and communicate at the same speed, regardless of the size of the sites they are visiting. Net neutrality is our right!

Vital for freedom of speech

—Erin Richardson, ,

Net Neutrality is probably important to everyone else but you - don't be egoistic

—Martin Axelsen, ,

Companies that provide internet services should treat all lawful internet content in a neutral manner. Net neutrality is a founding guideline for the internet and what allows the internet to be the largest and most diverse platform for expression in the world. If companies want to use the internet they are welcome to, by following the established principle of net neutrality. Allowing companies to break this founding principle is not only an abandonment of our heritage and an offense to the culture and collective intention of the internet, but it is a gross violation of equality since it allows corporations and the wealthy to unjustly appropriate more of the content, services, and yes, even infrastructure of the internet than is theirs to claim.

—Glen H. Barratt, Lexington, KY

Because I don't trust corporations with my freedom.

—Jason, ,

The internet is the only place where WE THE PEOPLE can escape the corporate plutocracy that plagues the USA. It is a place where I have LAUNCHED A BUSINESS and am able to COMPETE in the marketplace without having to check/pay with some CORPORATE OVERLORDE or pay through the roof fees. It is the only place where I can get my news and STAY INFORMED because the mainstream media is only interested in pushing their agenda. The power of the internet lies in it's readily available access to EVERYONE. Because it is available to everyone TRUE INNOVATION is allowed to thrive. I'm not sure why I have to tell this narrative Tom Wheeler? y'all are supposed to be qualified for those cushy FCC job's that y'all hold. I think your ass should be fired for bowing down to the corporate masters! Doesn't the FCC pay enough?

—Alex Trujillo, Denver, CO

No more should be discriminated from free speech. The free and open internet is a right for all, not corporations!!

—Darren Skotnes, Delmar, NY

I have zero trust in politicians, lawyers and corporations to do or say the right thing on my behalf. Freedom of the the net is as vital as oxygen, end of story.

—David, ,

For upholding Democracy - the real thing.

—Elisabeth Alington, ,

There should be no discrimination relating to the access of websites. There should be no slow lanes and fast lanes - just lanes where everybody should access the Internet freely.

—Carolyn Camputaro, Tucson, AZ

Free and open internet will foster growth and development.

—R J Lindquist, ,

Governments, their infrastructure/services, and every single internet user worldwide benefits from Net Neutrality protections. Only a few massive corporations profit (further) by striking down Net Neutrality, at a time when they can't be bothered to divert existing profits into meaningful broadband services infrastructure. Which side do you serve?

—G Reed, Cotati, CA

The only way to guarantee equal access to all, everyone's equal rights.

—Lilian Tejada, Woodstock, GA

I want the same access and speed as every one else and not be controlled by a telecom giant that wants control for the sole purpose to make money. I am a senior on limited income and should not be forced to use a slow service because of income, after all it was our generation that helped these telecom company s grow into there giant status by buying there services over the years

The internet is the last bastion of the "free press." It is important for people to be able to share thoughts and innovation without repression and control in order to retain public liberty.

—Suzanne Lewis, ,

Net neutrality is important to me because it allows the free expression of an individual without an internet provider charging me extra for seeing said person. It also keeps the settings of a video buffering from an internet provider neutral.

—Michael Rogan, Westhampton Beach, NY

Because the internet is open to me, I can maintain my nursing license without having to go to expensive seminars to earn my continuing education units. When I was a young girl, I spent hours in the library just researching and it was wonderful, but limited. Now I can learn anything. The sky is the limit.

—Roseann Fiore, New Kensington, PA

The FCC needs to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers as the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like and protect my rights to a free and open internet.

—Ralph W. Tobin, Fort Worth, TX

No one wants a slow lane. Just leave it be.

—Kristian Goodman, ,

In order for us to grow as a species we must learn and share all our knowledge and stop trying to bottle neck it all into money making channels. We must work together and enable everyone to beable to have access to the internet. In a free cane open way. This should be a basic human right

—Dan Elder, ,

The greed of some do not outweigh the good of the many.

—Jennifer Legere, ,

Corporations and the wealthy already have privileges and power which the common (and far more numerous) people do not. Sacrificing equal internet speed and access is inexcusable. All users pay for internet and deserve to be served equally. The internet is an invaluable resource which countless millions of people rely on for many things and should not be subject to preferential treatment. We should not be robbed of our money and rights for the sake of an elite few monopolizing full power of the internet.

Putting the internet under the control of companies would enable them to limit what people can see-after all, once they have the power to block websites on a whim, I doubt that greedy corporations would care if they paid their fees or not. Do you really want America to end up being owned by big businesses?

—Isaac Bull, Chesham,

The neutral nature of the internet is both it's greatest strength and the main reason of its success. Changing this would destroy it forever.

—Alexandre Maravilla, ,

Reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality. Access to information under fair standards is a human right and denying that is NOT PROGRESSIVE FOR SOCIETY.

—Bernard Green, Wellington,

The Internet is a place for freedom of speech and expression. To take this freedom away would be devastating to the lives and intellectual freedom of humans around the world. It would also put even more power in the hands of the one percent, thus further destabilizing the United States and global economy and society. In fact, a recently published study by NASA states that in order for the human race to survive, we MUST distribute resources more equally and provide more human rights to all people. Failure to do so actually risks the stability of the entire human race. To put so much power in the hands of so few is a death wish for the survival of humanity as a whole, simply so that a powerful few can have more money and power today. Do not commit such an act. You do so at the risk of yourselves and the global society.

—Amber Hoenig, Chicago, IL

Corporate control of ANY information flow sets a dangerous precedent.

Net Neutrality is vital for the continued growth of our scientific, educational and creative fields.

—Briana Giardina, Costa Mesa, CA

I use the internet to do research on solutions for climate change as do many of my colleagues. I feel this sort of open net is essential to the future of humanity.

—Char OBrien, Haiku, HI

The freedom of information alone is reason enough why there should always be net neutrality. We will be going backwards in more ways than one without it. What do you want? "State run" internet and news information like China and others with communist rule?

I am a retired person with limited income. I rely on my computer for many things. It is unconscionable that the Internet should become the plaything of the Telecoms who would instantly jack up the price for its use and slow it down if one refused to pay their blackmail price.

—Judith Beltz, La Porte, IN

The internet is the most democratic institution today because everyone has a say. If you have a computer and internet access you have a voice. It is very important to keep the internet free and impartial. Net neutrality is a must in a free and democratic society.

As without Net Neutrality the internet as we know it will cease to exist, ISPs will charge as extra for access to common sites such as YouTube, Facebook and Reddit, otherwise they will place us in slow lanes. This is destroying the freedom we once had online and will cause the giants to tower over the small. PLEASE protect Net Neutrality.

—Canon Delaney, ,

Because anything that changes the Internet for the worse needs to be shut down. It's gone from an anonymous zone already to a place where almost everything is monitored in a short period of a decade.

—Ms. Brianna Belliveau, Lunenburg, NS

If you really believe in freedom and democracy in the US, as is so frequently proclaimed, then you will protect the most democratizing and liberating development the world has seen: the internet. —Andrew Thomas, Antioch, TN

It is our right to have equal access to the internet. There are already many students like myself struggling to even afford internet and if net neutrality is destroyed it will make it even harder for us. It is already difficult in a society that goes against helping us to progress, survive, and succeed as individuals and as a country. Don't you want your family and future generations to live in a world of equal access to information, equal chances of education, equal chances of survival, and with the rights that our nation was founded on?

Corporations in America have maintained a competitive advantage in almost every industry over the last few decades through a combination of large-scale tax breaks, resource pools, complete protection in using aggressive competitive tactics, and the eyes/ears of politicians and government insiders. The Internet represents one of the few surviving means of equal competition for smaller businesses, and a last bastion of hope against the lopsided might of the America oligopolies. If the equality America once stood for is to remain even a fleeting possibility, the destruction of preferential treatment for those organizations that have money to burn must be stopped! Say no to the destruction of Net Neutrality, and preserve the last hope for equality in the American Economy.

Personally, I use it for entertainment. Professionally, I use it to maintain the PCs in my company's offices around the world (End User Support Technician for a global technology leasing company.) Without a neutral Internet, many companies would reduce their staff or close altogether because the level of access they need to function would cost too much. My company would probably close or move its base of operation to Europe. The Big Telecom ISPs are not going to make money off of this venture. I predict they will loose customers. I think of all the harm you are about to cause, and the fact that you can stop this nonsense this minute, but you will not. There will be subpoenas to Capitol Hill, and the questioning, when all the jobs go away. And the second Great Depression, that we were able to avoid from the 2008 market crash, will happen when you take the Internet away. We will know who to point to as the starting point in the mess you are about to create. I pray for you to make the right decision and for your well being. I will find another job. I'm good at that. Many others are not so good at it.

Sincerely, John T Kerry St. Louis, MO

I intend to start my business when I graduate and I will use Adobe software and the internet to make my living. If this plan is enacted it will make it harder for me, as a SMALL business man to compete with my larger competition who can afford faster and therefore better access to the internet. Thank you

It allows everyone to express their opinions and ideas world-wide. It connects people across this nation and the planet like never before. It allows us to fight back against injustices and inequality with very little funding and instant connectivity. Corporations must not be allowed to control or silence our free speech. The internet has become a required part of our daily lives, and must be an equal ground for all. It has become a public utility, and we need it.

—Brian Stumpp, Stockton, CA

I depend on a free and open internet, with equal access for all. This is essential for our freedom.

—Sky Vanderlinde, Haydenville, MA

Big business is trying to take even more control of our lives. This is just another money grab which will act to the detriment of many millions whilst filling the pockets of a few. Say enough is enough now, do not let them do this, support Net Neutrality (by law if needs be).

The Big Media Corporations are set to wring more money out of ordinary consumers. This simply is Corporate theft that has no relationship to their actual costs. The FCC must mandate a level playing field for everyone and order these Corporations to stop trying to class internet services on different levels. Not only is it not right, but it is immoral! Please put a stop to their endless quest for ever increasing profits.

We live in an incredible time. Never before in history have minds had access to innovation and voices truly been able to be heard. To impede that for money is nothing short of monstrous.

—Mike Fitzgerald, Chesapeake, VA

Unfettered access to the internet should remain available to all. I am totally opposed to this transparent international corporate greed which is what Big Telecom is about and it must be stopped.

—Ken Crawford-Condle, Melbourne,

Keeping the internet as it is rather than allowing for companies (/Internet service providers) to slice it up like a plot of land for the sake of padding out their wallets further is something we should all be working toward. We don't need nor want an "internet slow lane" in any way, shape, or form. Please stand up and defend Net Neutrality, and stop ISPs' from enforcing their greedy plan.

—Brandon Bundy, Hopewell, VA

DO NOT give the internet to the telecom companies! How can you even consider it? The internet is ESSENTIAL to modern life. It's a utility, as vital to our nation as water and electricity. DO NOT LET THEM RUIN IT.

—Capt Paul M.T. Savoy, Sullivan, ME

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

I want the internet to remain as a neutral field in which large rich entities/corporations do not have the power to govern content at the expense of everyone else. Any thing other than net neutrality is unfair and anti competitive. What has happened to FREE enterprise. If these corporations need an unfair advantage to be profitable it is not therules that need to change. Do not reward these types of behavior.

I am a web developer. I make websites for individuals, start-ups & corporations. All my clients currently have equal opportunity in providing an accessible & efficient web service that has the potential to greatly add value to their online presence, brand, and especially any information they wish to communicate. A lack of net neutrality will greatly hinder any potential for any individual, start-up, or corporation that do not have the resources to buy into a "leveraged" net presence. This will not only affect my clients but myself as a budget that would cover "sane" (current) practices could potentially have to be re-evaluated to accommodate for a "leveraged" net presence that would sacrifice the quality of their online presence, my pay, or could even mean lack of work for myself. Keep net neutrality, it works, it's fair, and makes for a better online experience for everyone.

The FCC & federal regulators MUST reclassify broadband service as a public utility, which would allow for the requirement of net neutrality rules. We want to reclassify ISPs as Title II common carriers. A common carrier is required to provide service in general terms and indiscriminately.

—Peter Heiberg, ,

I live in a very rural community, and much of my communication and education takes place via the internet and email. The notion that this critical service might be provided subject to the amount you were able to pay is an affront to the concept of open technology, available to everyone. This is a utility, not an optional, pay for speed service. I urge you to reject big business' efforts to hijack Net Neutrality. Matt O'Neill

—Matthew Luke O'Neill, Laytonville, CA

The Internet is one of the very few places on Earth where anyone can share information, spread new ideas, and generally show that they are more than citizen # 15719 but actually a real individual with interests and a personality. However this can only be maintained if we have Net Neutrality or the internet will become the same few messages from the same boring companies. Do not allow the world to become a more depressing and pathetic place as so many in the past have.

—Kevin Rhys Manley, Santa Maria, CA

Being disabled and retired, I depend on the Internet for a lot of my shopping and news. I also do a lot of contact with my family and friends this way. If I had to pay more I would be in a bad spot, as I am on a fixed income. The Internet needs to remain "Net Neutral". If it doesn't, I am going to be put in a very difficult spot.

As an Australian, my internet is already heavily charged for slow speeds. This model would further these costs and provide no benefits to me as an average citizen, and similarly to American citizens. I do not believe that in good conscience, you, as lawmakers, can further this proposal and consider yourselves as representatives of the people.

—Catherine Adams-Acton, ,

The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. Plus it is a sell out to the Big Telecom's.

—Gerald Alexander, Windsor, CA

Net Neutrality is possibly the single greatest asset to free speech and democracy in all of history.

—Christian Deck, Prince George,

Net neutrality is important to me because keeps the big ISPs from squashing both competition and ingenuity. The internet is able to exist and flourish because it is equally open to everyone. To allow ISPs to filter content is tantamount to censorship. Given the option, why would (for example) Verizon allow its clients to receive web-served advertisements supporting a politician that disagrees with their ideals, or advertising a service that competes with theirs? What would prevent them from blocking traffic to any website that advertises or sells a service that competes with theirs? Net Neutrality is important to me because the little guy should always have the opportunity to topple the giant. Google, Amazon.com and Facebook are just a few examples of companies that could not have been successful without Net Neutrality.

—Jim Allen, ,

The Internet was created, maintained, and is currently in in the future supported by tax dollars. It is therefore Congressionally unconstitutional for anyone to discriminate based on legal use of the internet. This especially includes Internet Service Providers, which in my opinion should be a government agency and service provided by the Post Office. The Internet is already by definition a public utility, so it should be classified as being neutral once you are connected. The violations of privacy and overall monopoly inherent to packet determinations (usage of data and destination) are staggering, and abuse WILL happen. It is inevitable and already has happened. Companies should be stripped of their ability to provide access to the web (and certainly should NOT be able to create fast and slow lanes) and a government-created and maintained fast internet access and email should be granted to all citizens, with kiosks in Post Offices all over the country.

Dear Telecom Lobbyists, a.k.a. Tom Wheeler and company, The internet is a taxpayer-funded, government project in its incarnation, current state, maintenance, and future development. Back in the DARPA/ARPANET days, the funding for this project was contingent that NO PRIVATE COMPANY would have any kind of control or dominion over it. In fact, it is ridiculous that profiting from web access is allowed at all, let alone allowing throttling or DISCRIMINATION based on communications and content being viewed or created. Yes, it is DISCRIMINATION to allow a company to profit from a "fast-lane" access or any kind of throttling or access control. If this is allowed, the public will do everything to not only undo this based on DISCRIMINATION in a GOVERNMENT PROJECT, but we will ALSO do everything to undo ANY KIND OF PROFIT FROM ISPs. Yes, if you allow them to be greedy and you continue to be a shill of the internet providers, you're going to cause us to fight back against ANY kind of profit-making on the back of this CONGRESSIONALLY-APPROVED, TAXPAYER-FUNDED technology that, by definition, CANNOT ALLOW DISCRIMINATION BASED ON COMMUNICATIONS CONTENT, otherwise known as violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Stop this worship of corporations. If President Obama won't follow through on his CAMPAIGN PROMISE of making and keeping the internet NEUTRAL, then Tom Wheeler and any other lobbyist in government clothing should be FIRED and replaced by someone who understands that one cannot reasonably exist as an American without a neutral, inexpensive, high-quality internet. In closing, we should have a Post-office provided and maintained email and web access that is the fastest speed given to ALL, and preserve the neutral internet along with providing the "ACA" equivalent of internet access. Stop being greedy. Represent the people, not the corporations, which are NOT PEOPLE. E Fredric Eugene, OR Open Internet, Net Neutrality and Common Carriage are Logically, Technically and Morally Superior to FCC proposals. The FCC proposals when viewed from an evidence base are a move in the wrong direction logically, technically and morally. The Internet was created from and for the social good. Corporate parasitisation of the common good to overcome its internal limitations and tendency towards unprofitability is to court social, technical and ecological death.

The internet is the only form of communication that currently exists that is truly on an even playing field for everyone. All other forms of communication have such high capital and technical requirements that the average person cannot use them to generate their own content and allow others to see or hear it. If the concept of an internet slow lane is allowed to take hold then it will make it much more expensive for home users to send their own content out onto the internet. This will of course mean that the only voices heard on the internet will be those with pockets big enough to get their content onto the fast lane. This will make the internet no different than any other form of communication.

I have always been proud of our country's Declaration of Independence and The Bill of Rights, which is an EXTREMELY IMPORTANT PART OF AMERICA'S CONSTITUTION. Sadly, the government we have in the United States today bears very little resemblance to the blueprint laid down by Our Forefathers, who drafted and/or supported it's ratification. This LEGAL DOCUMENT has been superceded by greed on the part of a large portion of Congressmen and women, the Supreme Court, and our Presidents, who have been seduced by the perks, monetary contributions and influence wielded by Huge Corporations. If you polled the AVERAGE AMERICAN, (THE 99% OF THE NON-WEALTHY), you would find that most of us believe our elected and appointed officials are merely puppets for the Mega-Wealthy Family Dynasties who run the corporations that do the lobbying of U.S. government officials, and hire unethical lawyers to circumvent our Constitution. These Corporate Entities work within our government system and operate "LEGALLY" for their own good and Bottom Line, NOT FOR THE GOOD OF THE AVERAGE AMERICAN. Our laws in this country are SUPPOSED TO BE DEMOCRATIC, AND SERVE THE NEEDS AND RIGHTS OF THE MAJORITY. These Uber-rich individuals that sit on countless Boards of Directors as their Chairman, are the 1% who are controlling our Nation's policies at home and abroad. The Natives are getting very restless and are fed up with the ruthlessness of Corporate control. We are fighting back in vast numbers and making Our Power known. It is a case of The-Haves and The Have-Nots. History has proven many times, that when Push Comes to Shove, the Masses ALWAYS TRIUMPH. It would be a tragedy of major proportions if there was armed conflict in this country again. War is always a last resort of desperate people who feel their government is totally out of touch with the masses. We want to work within the system we love, hoping that we can appeal to individuals who have the authority, responsibility, and moral conviction to do what is right for, We The People. I IMPLORE YOU ON BEHALF OF THE MAJORITY OF AMERICANS TO SEARCH YOUR CONSCIENCE, TO MAKE THE CHOICE THAT WILL BENEFIT THE MAJORITY. THE F.C.C. HAS TO POWER TO MAKE A MOMENTOUS DECISION AND RIGHT SOME OF THE WRONGS THAT HAVE BEEN PERPETRATED BY "Big Money." This decision made by the F.C.C. WILL SET A PRECEDENT for other government agencies and individuals to follow. This could be the Breakthrough that will lead our country back to the government our Forefathers envisioned. Cyberspace is as real as earth, land, and sea. We do business there, send Official documents, handle our Financial transactions, make social connections and a host of other activities vital to our society. The Internet is a MAJOR SOURCE OF KNOWLEDGE. Any time I don't know something all I have to do is surf the Web and I'll find the answer. I learn things constantly by reading articles. What would happen to our Educational System if certain websites were blocked? This censorship by ANY PERSON OR BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT SMACKS OF HITLER'S GESTAPO, and The Burning of The Books. History shows how a population of individuals with only one source of information, (their Dictator), can be brainwashed into committing atrocities against their fellow man. I believe, as do many others, that the United States Government is ALMOST a Police State. The F.C.C. could lead the way in upholding Human Rights for ALL THE PEOPLE IN THE WORLD, NOT JUST U.S. citizens. The Internet is a GLOBAL RESOURCE and should be protected by all the National Governments in this world. The United States has always set the example for other countries to follow; yet another reason why this decision about the Internet is so important. I would like to make my point with Gun Control. As soon as the government got a toehold, they kept pushing and pushing the door wider. It is difficult for a person to own a gun and the government has a record of everyone who owns one. It has been a historical precedent that U.S. citizens are the best armed population in the world. Our second amendment gives us that right. No coincidence that recently there has been a lot of debate as to what our Forefathers meant by the right to protect ourselves. It's pretty elementary. They were revolutionaries who had just overthrown a regime in which The People had no say in the decisions made that affected their daily lives. Our Forefathers wanted to insure that if that situation ever arose again, that we could FIGHT FOR OUR RIGHTS. Their cry was, "Taxation Without Representation." Most Americans do not believe our government represents their rights. It is now, the EXACT THE SAME SITUATION AS IT WAS THEN. Once our corporate controlled government gets a toehold on the Internet they will keep pushing until they have TOTAL CONTROL, just as they have been doing with Gun Control. Manipulating the Masses with their Monopoly of almost ALL MEDIA IN THIS COUNTRY. They control Television Networks, Newspaper Networks, Magazine Networks. The Internet is the ONLY COMMUNICATION SYSTEM THE RICH DO NOT HAVE THE MAJORITY OF THE CONTROL OF. Our government has laws preventing monopoly of communication systems, yet the only time in my lifetime, that these laws were ever used were to break up a monopoly of a communication system was with AT&T. Google and other major players on the Internet want the public to know how they have been forced keep track of American's online activity, not just for advertising purposes as their technology was designed for, but to supply the United States government with information that invades our Right to Privacy. (Again, the Gestapo at Work). How else can they weed out the Political Dissidents? There are even more arguments and examples I could make. In the wake of the N.S.A.'s spying, Americans are very uncomfortable about governmental control of the Internet. There are laws on the books that the F.C.C. can use to uphold Net Neutrality. I pray that you will use them to the benefit of ALL HUMANKIND--or at least for the 99% of us! My heartfelt thanks for taking the time to read my letter. Please think about the arguments I have made for Net Neutrality. Sincerely, Shira L Musil Internet neutrality is paramount to what remains of western democracy and free-thought around the world. This obviously profit-steered agenda will undoubtedly incite protests and revolutionary action, stop trying to privatize the internet.

—Lon, ,

Because of the internet, I can work from ANYWHERE that has an internet connection. In fact, I am writing this from my portable "office" in S. Florida while my family and I visit with my in-laws as we have been doing for the past week. Because of a free and open internet, I am able to do this - yet still work 40+ hrs a week, and communicate in real time with my colleagues including our twice weekly video conferences - without ever missing a deadline or meeting. To me, this makes the internet a utility, like electricity or water. Without it, my lifestyle would not be possible and the financial well being of my family would be threatened. Telecommuters like myself are the newest addition to the "working class" of people - we are a new type of American career employee. There are thousands and thousands and thousands of us, with more joining our ranks daily. We have a massive and distinct impact on our local, state and national economies. As living, breathing, WORKING American citizens, our positions in this new internet-based ecosystem are potentially fragile to the whims of the establishment, and our right to work will not be denied or compromised to further the agenda of anti-capitalist corporations steadily heading towards monopolistic / oligarchic control of our tenuously free society. I urge the FCC to reverse this current trend of siphoning away our rights and our freedoms into the overflowing coffers of the rich and powerful. Classify the internet as a utility in the name of a public increasingly angered, alienated and ignored by a government formerly of the people. It's time to let us know that we matter, are heard, and are represented. The public will only stay divided for so long.

—Craig Varian, Bryson City, NC

Net neutrality has become symbolic to me of the success of the U.S. In giving all citizens equal rights. It is one of the few things that has not been turned over to the corporations and rich to exploit for their own benefit. I am an independent voter and am horrified at the direction our country is going. I do not want to be the generation that gave away democracy in the U.S. Please do not give this last bastion of equality away. Thank You.

As I mentioned in an earlier comment, the Internet is, what libraries have historically been, the source for information on a wide range of subjects for most Americans. We wouldn't tolerate libraries accepting money from an author to make certain books more readily available than others, nor should we tolerate a similar practice in The Internet.

The internet is a powerful communications tool that has opened whole new venues for economic growth and new ideas. It has improved and opened communication venues between different groups and cultures who may not have otherwise come into contact. And to keep it that way, it needs to remain open and equal to everyone, regardless of their economic status or ability to pay off a telecom racket.

Small businesses, all internet users and our democracy depend on net neutrality!! Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers!!!

—Matson, Lake Oswego, OR

We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—V Chari, Brooklyn, NY

Net Neutrality is important to me because I get to pick the services and data I want to receive.

The internet is the one thing that makes the world available to me. The added expense would take that away from me as I am sure it would be with thousands of other people. The government needs to think of the voters not just big business. They tried to pick our pockets a few years ago don't give this to them now. The Internet was given away without royalty by Tim Berners-Lee because he believed in an uninhibited, free flow of Information worldwide for everyone, in an era where Television still dictated who would be elected president and what qualified as news. Allowing neighborhood monopolies (or oligopolies) of Internet Access to instigate a two-class System (one of which being maddening and impossible to use with today's rate of data flow) recalls 1984: "If you want a vision of the future, imagine a boot stamping on a human face - forever." We are at the brink of a true Democracy where every Person on the planet can be equally and as quickly well-informed, for the first time in the history of mankind freed from dependency on mass media and capable of positively and truly contributing to decisions that are best for the greatest amount of people. A free Internet is the unprecedented cure against so many evils based on ignorance, and the ground rules that will be decided on so hard to undo, let this not be legislation to bias Information away from us for yet another ten thousand years, but legislation that will set a Spirit of law in keeping with the growth-affirming note set by this very new fight for freedom.

People have the right to fair pricing as well as their freedom of choice. One problem we have here in Ontario Canada is not internet based but television based programming by the same companies supplying our internet as well. Once they get you signed up you have very little control as to what is available for viewing. Most of the programming is to repetitive and very little new programing unless you sign up for the expensive program packages so people on fixed incomes get didly squat for new movies or newer programs. If the control of our internet goes the same way they are going to price themselves out of the market and be out of reach for most of the people who are enjoying the limited services we are now receiving. I can only pray that the whole idea gets back to giving the public a fair choice to them at a fair price for all to enjoy.

—Larry Romano, ,

I am a senior citizen on fixed limited income and rely on access to the Internet for contact with friends & family & to pay bills and so on. I also live 25 miles from the nearest town and already have to pay a lot for access because only satellite is available. In addition I am a writer and editor and so need the Internet to do my work -- and every penny counts. Many people are in similar circumstances and all of us need fast access and no higher costs. Please do not believe the corporate arguments. Protect then real people not the corporate profits.

—Maria Cadwallader, Valparaiso, NE

We depend on equal access to the web to be effective citizens. Don't take this away!

—Susan Heitner, Brooklyn, NY

Please do not give away the Internet to private concerns. It will only serve these big businesses to charge us a premium for very slow speeds unlike other countries that already provide far higher speed access for the same price. Our government was formed to provide consumer protection. In this instance it should be equity and freedom from being gouged by the big internet providers. Allow competition to flourish but the benefit must be always in the best interest of the people, the consumers, and not pandering to Big Corp. Please vote to maintain Net Neutrality. Thank you.

—Bruce Wolfe, San Francisco, CA

Big corporations should not control or limit access to the Internet, nor should it become more expensive to use. It is fine the way it is--a wonderful, open channel of communication opening the world to all.

The Internet is a level playing field where everyone can have a voice and express themselves. Net Neutrality is essential to this free ethos. Big businesses shouldn't have the right to say who can use and publish to the Internet just because they have more money than the little guy. The Internet is a place of freedom and free speech and no company should be able to dictate what can or cannot be viewed on it or limit website that don't share their point of view or won't increase their profits. I am sick and tired of paying excessive amounts of dollars just for the use of the internet. Also as it now stands for the speed that I get for my dollars the internet providers should be charged with robbery. Although I believe that nothing will be achieved going after these companies until the Harper government is tossed out of power.

—Frank Carroll, ,

There is no justifiable reason other than profit for already rich companies. If you want actual free market and capitalism then let the market decide which ISP will survive. I don't need companies making back door deals to fill their wallets.

—Sina Kashanizadeh, ,

Net neutrality is the only way to guarantee fair business practices over the web as well as uncensored access to information. As more companies are heading to cloud computing to do business or even license their products to consumers it is more important than ever to have equal access to the Internet. It shouldn't be up to the service provider what content you can or cannot view but to the individual. The Internet allows freedom of expression that has not been experienced before in any other generation before.

—Mr. Matthew D Summers, Edmonton, AB

My life has the internet as a large part of it; much of the content I enjoy is through the internet, I contact friends through the internet, and one day I hope to be able to make content and distribute it through the internet. Net Neutrality is important to me because without it, all of these things will be taken away; unfair charging fees would be prevalent everywhere. Want to talk to friends? Pay the Skype monthly fee or have it blocked! Want to watch videos? Special video monthly package! Want to make something? It will become a rich mans playground run on greed EVERYONE benefits by Net Neutrality, Don't destroy the Internet.

—Lynn Baker, ,

Dear FCC, Net Neutrality is a concept that all data flowing on the Internet should be treated equally by traveling at the same speed. Net Neutrality should not be confused with the term download speed. Download speed is the speed that data downloads on one's computer. It's not the speed of data traveling over the Internet. Net Neutrality is a concept about ensuring that data flows over the Internet at the same speed for all websites. But big companies with their large sums of money are lobbying in order to have faster data speeds on the Internet for their websites. This gives them an unfavorable advantage over small businesses and might prevent innovation. Small business websites such as <http://www.aintitcool.com/> helped pioneer the Internet. Ain't It Cool News is a movie news & review website. It was created by Harry Knowles, when he was sick in bed in the mid-90s'. Ain't It Cool has made such a huge impact, that Hollywood actually care what this website says about its movies. Another example of a small business success story is the horror movie news website <http://www.upcominghorrormovie s.com>. Upcoming Horror Movie News has also been around since the 90s'. Other examples of movie news websites include <http://www.latino-review.com/> and <http://geektyrant.com/>. On <http://www.codeproject.com/>, computer programmers can discuss and find answers to programming. Code Project has over ten million members. All these small business websites help put food on the table, pay rent, create jobs and pay off college tuition. Some also create an extra source of income for families. So please defend Net Neutrality. Please feel free to forward this e-mail to every politician in the country. Sincerely, Abrar Qureshi

—Abrar Qureshi, Willowbrook, IL

At the very least, net neutrality allows a free and open forum to locate, receive and share data and if this should change, the way information is distributed falls in the hands of the highest paid customer, and the public is less informed of an already out of control economic and political system.

It's the only way to learn what's really going on in the world, what with the media controlled by big money interests and actively spreading false propaganda about everything that doesn't promote their continued raping of our economy.

—Susan Roberts, Tumwater, WA

I want to support equal opportunity and access to smaller organizations/companies/websites. Also, I imagine this will only make costs rise again limiting access and information while promoting a one sided agenda for what the Internet should be.

—Spencer T Corbin, Bow, WA

The Internet is DEFINITELY a public utility, similar to public libraries-- and Much more useful. The fact that some uses involve profit-making just means that we (the people) have not kicked those profit-makers out of OUR library. All the same, NO ONE should be able to carve out a private, profit-making space that would squeeze out any public uses.

I telecommute everyday. I don't want ISPs to artificially limit my access, especially VPN connections.

—Neal White, Smyrna, GA

The Internet should provide the same possibilities for everyone. It is a chance. Cutting chances of potentially making money for people with less money is not a decision for a healthy society and will backfire badly long term.

Just leave the Net alone. Governments have screwed the people the world over and it's time to take a break

—Cris Frede, ,

Corporations want control to make more money and governments want control to serve corporations. Don't use the internet to try to control people's freedom; this only serves to become another tool to stifle people's creativity and avoid allowing people to form a community to work for a bigger future.

—Patrick Lynch, ,

The internet is for everyone and anyone not just big business should have advantages. Keep net neutrality

—Jessica Beasley, Indianapolis, IN

1. Equal Access - no forced lanes of traffic per se....however, AT&T has already crossed the line (no pun intended) because they already charge for a fast lane with Uverse and were charging extra for speeds with DSL. Now they want to have it all profitable at my expense. The internet provides me with information that I would not acquire if I did not have access to a variety of new sources. It allows me to participate in a virtual world where I can express my artistic talents for free like the air we breathe. However, it is becoming polluted with commerce that invades even our e mail. I remember when I had the ability to make a land call 911 for emergency.....and I did not have to pay for it. Why, because it was in the Nation's National Security to keep it's citizens safe. The City where I live tried to impose a fee for every emergency call they received with some kind of sliding scale. Another attempt at profitability over the safety of the citizen. Thank goodness, the people complained loud enough and the effort for more fees subsided. Keep an Open Internet aka Net Neutrality by reinforcing the common carrier rules and make them stronger....protect me from this corporate commerce assault on my digital freedoms. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment in the people and not the shareholders portfolios. We are the people and these mega telecom corps are invading our commons. Make a formal reclassification of providers of internet and all communication emanating from it as a "commons" service on behalf of the citizens, not the limited shareholders who's investment goes into their pockets. Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers and protect the Open Internet aka Net Neutrality

For our freedom

—Vera Hill, ,

- I'm a professor at 2 universities (Fordham & S.V.A), teaching over 100 students per year in film and animation. To get jobs, my students create websites to promote their art. - Most of these students cannot afford Internet fast lanes. They're struggling artists. - Without Net Neutrality, my students' websites will be in the slow lane. No one will see (or have the patience to wait downloading page views). These students will no longer get attention from prospective employers for jobs. - Their careers will not survive. They will starve. Make no mistake about it – without net neutrality, their futures are over. James Grimaldi Adjunct Professor at S.V.A & Fordham University

—James Grimaldi, New York, NY

Corporations should not be determining the speed and access to the internet. To allow ISPs to run the show will turn the internet into a total commercial entity. This was not the intent of open and free access.

—Jim Kippen, Plymouth Meeting, PA

The internet is an important tool for democracy and needs to be protected from special interests. Keep the internet free, keep America free.

—Kai Sawyer, Deer Harbor, WA

Net neutrality is the First Amendment of the Internet, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data equally. As an Internet user, net neutrality is vitally important to me. The FCC should use its Title II authority to protect it. Most Americans have only one choice for truly high speed Internet: their local cable company. This is a political failure, and it is an embarrassment. America deserves competition and choice. Without net neutrality, a bad situation gets even worse. These ISPs will now be able to manipulate our Internet experience by speeding up some services and slowing down others. That kills choice, diversity, and quality. It also causes tremendous economic harm. If ISPs can speed up favored services and slow others, new businesses will no longer be able to rely on a level playing field. When ISPs can slow your site and destroy your business at will, how can any startup attract investors? My friends, family, and I use the Internet for conversation and fun, but also for work and business. When you let ISPs mess with our Internet experience, you are attacking our social lives, our entertainment, and our economic well being. We won't stand for it. ISPs are opposing Title II so that they can destroy the FCC's net neutrality rules in court. This is the same trick they pulled last time. Please, let's not be fooled again. Title II is the strong, legally sound way to enforce net neutrality. Use it.

—David Warner, Durham, NC

Individuals conduct a huge amount of business on the internet everyday. Speed is important to us.

—Miles Boucher, Liberal, KS

Net neutrality is incredibly important to me because it protects the basic principles on which the internet culture is based on: true equality. It may be a bit anarchist or communist for the American government, but I'm not asking the capital to participate, only to allow their constituents to, which is what America is based on. Thank you, and please keep Net Neutrality alive.

—Eric Jedel, San Jose, CA

The internet should be for all regardless of their wish to control or profit. It is a wonderful and life saving device for those in remote and disadvantaged counties and areas. Prime examples have been the ability to send for and receive information in the huge number of natural and man made disasters the world has faced in the last few years.

I have used the internet since before Google, Netflix, or Amazon became giants. I remember these companies as startups. Net neutrality is essential for the next big thing to have a chance to be noticed and to grow.

—Mr. Carl Stonebraker, Elk Grove Village, IL

The Internet is a medium founded by, and flourishing under, the shared effort and creativity of thousands of individuals, who were given the ability to do so, in turn, by the freedom the medium provides. Removing this freedom, this neutrality, and so on, will stifle this growth, and cause stagnation.

—Iain Macnab-Stark, ,

This isn't just about money, its about where the money flows and how much as well as to whom, when , where and most importantly why. All of our lives, not just Americans, but throughout the entire world, we have all been taught that we are beholden to the handful of multinational corporations that already own pretty much 80% of everything. If you kill net neutrality you put even more unchecked executive power in the hands of those who already have too much. Certain sectors of any true free republic's infrastructure, especially those that govern, maintain and facilitate the distribution of critical resources should always be categorized as utilities for various reasons, one of the most important being to keep any one particular private trust from monopolizing the control of any critical public resource. The Internet should be written in to the Constitution as a utility with a million regulations and checks and balances, particularly against whatever governmental administration or private corporation who either holds sway over some part or aspect of it or who may seek to govern it sovereign and above impunity and outside anything other than their own jurisdiction. We are not just talking about the control of any one particular subscription service or any singular service provider, we are talking about control over the only subscription service, the internet itself, technically the interweb, all of the internets. All of the internets. This form of communication, it isn't just a means of communication, this globalized network is still evolving, still integrating technologies and facilitating their advancement, and it always will be evolving so long as we keep hacking it and don't destroy it along the way. Already in its infantile state it has revolutionized human revolutions themselves, and I'm not just talking about some metaphysical intellectual notion of a revolution, nor am I just talking about very real human revolts like the so called Arab Spring or OWS. The internet is most crucial in the scientific and most undoubtedly in finacial realms as well otherwise we wouldn't be having this conversation. If that is what we're having, you know a democratically based public forum over something rather important to us all. THis discussion and any decision on Net Neutrality should be held in the public, not the private sector. People should know better and specifically what exactly you are trying to wrangle, and the very serious ramifications of your wrangling. You should all be ashamed of ourselves really, you either aren't doing your due diligence as representatives and office holders of and over the supposedly vote entitled citizens of the United States, or you are consciously hampering the efforts of those who are trying to.

—David Ull, Queens Village, NY

Net Neutrality is necessary, if we are ever hope to have a really peaceful world. Allowing powerful financial, who generally are only interested in making profit for their shareholders, would render the Net undemocratic.

—Edward Carr, ,

My broadband fee's are already substantial and I believe strongly that removing net neutrality will impact the availability of much of the internet for the majority of people. We have a platform in the internet that is being used more and more each day for innovation and more accessibility to services some people might not otherwise have. The things that can be achieved are only just being discovered however plans to commercialise the infrastructure and give priority to higher paying vendors will create opportunities only for monopoly and decimate possible innovation. Please do the right thing and preserve our net neutrality.

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

Personal freedom and integrity,

—Iztok Jovan, ,

The internet is a free and open resource that we've all integrated into our daily lives. It should not be treated as yet another way to extract outrageous ADDITIONAL profit on top of the fees and subscriptions we already pay. It is a resource that DOES create a level playing field for free expression, economic opportunity, and innovation. The fact that an 'internet slow lane' has even been proposed in our free society is an egregious insult. Society needs the internet, and we need to it be affordable for everyone. We must protect Net Neutrality.

—Stuart Cronshaw, ,

This is the last free frontier. It's not fair that big corporations once again get to use their power and money to take over and manipulate the internet in their favor. This is also eliminating any chance a small start up business has to grow because they are being forced by the corporations to pay for their business to receive a fair connection to their website. The bottom line is that this is corporate extortion for anyone trying to start a new website or web based business.

Net Neutrality is one of the few things that the working class has that Big Business hasn't destroyed with their greedy hands. FCC: You are a watchdog to protect the public welfare from those who would do that harm. Please do your job. There are enough foxes guarding the henhouse.

—Robert Fingerman, Monteagle, TN

It is extremely imperative that the Internet remain neutral. Without neutrality, we will only hear what big corporations and big money want us to hear. And that voice is extremely partisan towards the GOP and Tea Party's vision of rights for them and to hell with the rest of us who oppose their twisted, bigoted and overtly over the top religious ideologies. All voices must be heard regardless of the messages. It is through an open society that true democracy works best.

Free information and liberty to search and gather knowledge is a must and a forte that internet brought us. The Internet relies on its open nature to thrive and provide users everywhere with equal access to all forms of content. Using Chairman Wheeler's proposed rules to transform the network into a giant cash grab (in plain sight of the American people) is insulting and disheartening. Look at what the Internet provides with regard to cultural advancement -- availability of education; instantaneous access to news, artwork, and music (not simply for-profit entertainment, which is of course being targeted by the proposed slow/fast lanes in Wheeler's plan); improved interpersonal communication -- the list goes on. These things clearly elevate our culture planetwide. Are lawmakers so greedy that they would opt to make the rich richer rather than improve human society? (The answer, disappointingly, is yes, which is why we're pushing back.) Please make the right call. Do it in the public interest. Keep the Internet truly open. The voices of those who aren't multi-million-dollar corporations deserve to be heard out there.

Even if the FCC believes that their policy regarding Net Neutrality is workable in the specific case of the USA, the simple fact is that a great number of websites are either hosted in the US or are routed through the US network. As such, even for someone living half a world away like me, Net Neutrality in general and Net Neutrality in the US in particular is very important to me. I urge the FCC to rethink carefully the way they are going forward with their policy, less they will sign the death warrant for everyone's vibrant, creative, and free Internet that is essential for so many things, among them the very economic progress that the FCC claims they are trying to support through their policy.
—Duong Anh Tu, ,

This issue goes to the freedom of information, allowing internet users a level playing field so that all information has the opportunity to get though to readers. The proposed changes will result in the exploitation of certain internet users. Broadband providers should not be given the power to exploit in this manner. to eliminate steep tolls

—Kristen McLeod, ,

If giant telecom are able to make a "fast lane", there is no doubt in my mind this will instead result in a slow lane, and a more expensive lane that is the same speed as we get now. If this bill passes it will be an embarrassment to the US and will destroy the ability of companies to fairly compete with each other online. Please make the proper, and common sensical, choice.

—Steven Hall, ,

Dear monopolistic Internet clan(s) I demand that my Internet traffic be treated with neutrality and do not wish to be put in Internet slow-lane. -

Our world is becoming more and more technology based. The Internet is a fast way to get information out to the masses quickly so please do not let broadband providers block or slow down content that they might not like!

—Sharon Day, ,

The internet is the ultimate tool to share information equally across the world, if everyone has access to all the knowledge of all the other people, then there is a greater chance that everyone will be as close to equal as possible. Equality is good, because it means less people are in a significantly worse situation than others. And we should try to advance as a species, not just as individuals or as corporations. Anything that harms the many to aid the few is bad.

—Alexander, ,

Because I value my rights and freedoms and believe equality for everyone is of utmost importance.

The flow of information should not be restricted. All information should be available for a fully informed citizenry.

—Margaret Alia Denny, Denver, CO

The simple fact is that the internet's original intention was to provide people a means of communicating ideas openly and freely. The internet was not meant to be a the commodity it has become, so provide the average American inernet user the ability to enjoy the net neutral internet as intended by its "inventors".

My partner enabled and publicised moving documents between countries before the World Wide Web came into being for the purposes of making information freely available for all. Putting in a slow internet lane disadvantages the poor, including students, developing countries, start up companies, large families and those living in remote areas. It goes directly against his aim when publicising the method.

I believe in a free & open internet & to impose an so called "Internet Slow Lane" violates the 1st Amendment (the Freedom of Speech & Free Expression) which our forefathers enshrined 238 years ago. To impose this, one may as well tear up the U.S. constitution & live in an Orwellian Fascist Regime.

The internet belongs to the people here in the United States and I should remain as it is today. I understand why the communications giants desperately want to get their hands on the control levers of the internet but in no way would the changes they want help the American PEOPLE. Sure Comcast and the like are salivating but I sincerely hope the FCC will reject any and all of the changes the major communications companies want because it will greatly harm the American people and in the end isn't that the real business of the FCC? Please protect net neutrality! Do that and you will be speaking for the citizens and if you don't you are subjecting us all to rape.

Net neutrality is as important as free speech and crucial for a democratic world

—Lennart Lindberg, ,

Net Neutrality is mandatory for me because it promotes free enterprise that will be guided by the collective intelligence of the users, albeit more subject to ups and downs than if it were managed by "those that know". History is littered with the failures of such folk, despite their good intent and apparent "excellent" plans that promised so much. Cheers from down under. Anthony

—Anthony jebb, ,

I want to be able to do whatever life-necessity activities I need to do on the internet without any interference from corporations because they do not agree with whatever activities I do online. I want to communicate with my family and friends, and I also want to research topics, educate myself, and even make my own sustainable living with internet usage. People of all walks of life demand using the internet. Corporate influence will prohibit those people of all walks of life from using it. The voice of the consumer must triumph all else in this issue. The internet is for the people. It must be a public utility, alongside our electricity and other utilities. I do not want to be prohibited from doing what I wish to do online. Corporations cannot take advantage of us for their own gains. Please reclassify the internet as a public utility. Thank you.

A level playing field is essential for all business, new and old. Letting money dictate the speed of the internet would hurt new and small companies.

—Julie Wickstrom, Seattle, WA

No one should be discriminated against because of the size of their corporation or their profit margins. This country was founded on business principles, small businesses are the ones who are going to be negatively affected by a closed internet, and the people who believe that large corporations should not have rule over their lives need to stand up and speak out.

—Tammy Hopman, State Road, NC

the internet should be free for everyone!

—Jennifer Zero, Staten Island, NY

The Internet is the last bastion of free speech. This needs to remain so that the big news corporations cannot lie to the public quite as smoothly as they can if there is no free Internet.

—Em Kay, ,

The neutrality of the Net is crucial for democracy.

—Irene Gower, ,

The idea of allowing Internet Service Providers could potentially charge based upon content would be incredibly destructive to the United States and its citizens and other persons within its borders. Much of today's innovation and entrepreneurship occurs on the Internet or, at a minimum, requires Internet access and visibility to succeed. If the United States does not require net neutrality, the United States will simply continue to fall further behind the developed world and soon find itself surpassed by the developing world who are not stifled by such anti-citizen restrictions as Internet Service Providers now seek to impose. Without net neutrality, there will never again be another Amazon or Netflix or Facebook or Twitter in America again. Such new businesses will only exist in other countries who will not bother even seeking a customer base in the United States since access to their sites may be cost-prohibitive. On a personal level, I own a small law firm and rely upon the Internet and websites to generate clients. It is my primary means of advertising and finding business. My clients are generally Indian tribes and individual Indians who are already disadvantaged and have limited resources and Internet access. My area of law is not susceptible to "yellow page" advertising to generate business, particularly since my clients can be anywhere in the country. If suddenly my site cannot load as quickly or be accessed by individuals or potential clients, my small business will soon fail. The only appropriate approach to net neutrality is for the FCC to establish real net neutrality rules and, in particular, classify Internet Service Providers as common carriers.

Telecommunications companies should not be permitted to charge based on the content of data transmitted to/from my computer any more than they can charge me different telephone rates depending on whether my call is business or personal. The notion that there is not enough bandwidth to allow all content at the same speed is factually incorrect. The United States already suffers from one of the lowest speed Internet access in the developed world. If bandwidth is a problem, it is a problem of Internet Service Providers refusing to invest appropriately in new infrastructure and technologies to keep the United States internationally competitive. Most Internet Services Providers, particularly broadband, already have natural monopolies in the areas they serve, discouraging investment in infrastructure and new technologies. Consumers cannot simply choose to change ISPs since there is often no alternative or competition in their area. Eliminating net neutrality will simply exacerbate this problem. I urge the FCC to adopt a real net neutrality rule and reject the anti-consumer desires of corporate Internet Service Providers seeking to stifle competition and entrepreneurship.

—Brad Jolly, Brighton, CO

Net Neutrality is important to the people because we can gather and inform ourselves with information of all sorts without it being suppressed or manipulated by the government or huge money making scum bag corporations only looking for profit in money.

—Marcos Salazar, Los Angeles, CA

—Norda Gromoll, Eagle River, WI

Internet is a utility. You need to protect the American people and classify it as such.

—Chris watts, Anchorage, AK

I don't want to be forced into the slow lane, or have corporate giants deciding what will be available to me. What has made the internet so useful to me has been the access to a wide variety of businesses and opinions. I don't want anyone to make it less than it is: an invaluable, irreplaceable resource for information. Please support net neutrality. Thank you.

—Frances Strong, Saint Paul, MN

Being disabled it is practically the only interactive window to the world.

—Mark Corbin, Goshen, OH

I love to have free unbiased information at my finger tips.

—Merrill, ,

We already have enough "big brother" activity without layering additional fees on 'per use' basis for the internet to access a site(s) that should be as free as the owners of it deem appropriate. Basically this is an attempt at what would be considered legal extortion by the Big Telecoms of the world to further line their pockets.

—Rick Malyszka, ,

Net Neutrality is important economically, and in fact will be crucial in the coming years, to spread knowledge across the world to places that need it most. Given the variety of resource constraints the world will be facing over the next century, freedom of information access could save or doom communities trying to adapt to these changes. Neutral Net Wooo!

—Josh Dawes, ,

Only true Net Neutrality will enable all Americans to enjoy and profit from access to the Internet. Anything less will continue the tragic push to turn our nation into a two-tiered society, which our founding fathers NEVER intended it to become!

i believe and support anything that will keep the playing field even for all companies and for all users that connect with people from other countries. the internet should be used for all people to connect with and help each other to learn about different cultures and to help us understand what other people believe in. please keep the internet for all people. sincerely scott holmes

—Scott Holmes, ,

The internet is one of the last bastions of free speech not controlled by super-corporations. Don't let our freedom die. Keep the internet free and neutral. Benefit the human race, not the wallets of the super rich.

—Mr. Chris Calvert, Philadelphia, PA

The internet should be open to all without restrictions. It is a unified world collectively communicating without borders, and should stay that way.

—Paul Mallette, ,

Being on a fixed income any extra charges - like any for Internet use - is unreasonable for seniors. Keep the Internet free.

—Judith Elliott, Orlando, FL

I am sick to death of the FCC selling us out. First Michael Powell takes a multimillion dollar job/bribe to change the definition of the internet, and now Tom Wheeler wants to follow suit. The internet is a common carrier telecommunications utility. Always has been. It is my communications utility, and you grifters want to sell me out.

—Mike Michael Kelly, Huntington Beach, CA

Because, this is just another step to make the rich, richer and the other 99 %. gets the left overs. This would be upsetting if many foreign companies were doing this. It is absolutely criminal to be doing it in this country. Be for the people!

—W, Racine, WI

The net has created a global commons where the free exchange of ideas and perspectives can be shared among all people equally. Any law or policy that allows large providers to force lower quality service to others, creates an infrastructure that would make it easy to dictate different services levels even on a site basis. Ultimately, it upsets equality on the internet, by allowing those with deeper pockets to have a louder voice. And that's not neutral at all.

—Christina Bub, ,

People deserve equal access to this vital technology.

—Dana Craig, Norwood, MA

The big telecom companies already make too much money off the citizens of this country and in fact the world! It's obvious that our government entities and Congress have allowed this to happen. At one time our Congress ended monopolies but now we are back to that same state because the politicians are all in the pay of the huge monied corporations and they care nothing for the citizens because they just buy negative ads until they convince the idiots of this country to vote for the corrupt individuals that have sold us out....like Chairman Tom Wheeler!

—Sandra Brady, Pinellas Park, FL

There should not be 2 tier service. The Net should fair and equally accessible.

—Paul Hwang, ,

Don't want or need internet slow or fast lanes

—Kirk Hermsen, Bettendorf, IA

The Internet should belong to the people for the free and immediate transfer of ideas; not to for-profit corporations who already clog the sites with advertisements and pop-ups, banner ads, etc. Since the US Postal Service is fading, and slower than ever before, and energy inefficient, please preserve the free, fast Internet for the use of ordinary citizens.

—Sean Costello, Vergennes, VT

It helps to keep us all on a more equal footing. If only people with money can afford to use the internet, then there is one more area where people need to have money to fully participate in community and the world.

—S Turansky, ,

Corporations do things that are in their own best interest. In the case of the internet, what is in the best interest of ISPs is not in the best interest of the American people. Stand up for the American people and enforce an open internet. Enforce Net Neutrality.

—Wes Schlosser, Menomonee Falls, WI

Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

The open internet is helping the worlds societies through communication, truth and openness. If this tool which the world today is so dependent on changes and becomes censored (which is what will happen as accessibility is governed), then we are taking a huge step in the wrong direction. An open society is absolute key for a functioning and thriving society. This situation bares resemblance to an article about twitter censoring or in fact deleting users posting infomation critical to the Turkish government (<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2014/apr/20/twitter-blo-cks-accounts-critical-turkish-government/>). This is a dangerous situation as the people should be able to choose/discuss/communicate what they please about their own government, as this is the most logical way to maintain a happy and functioning society. What we need tho is for the internet to be the equivilant of Twister to Twitter. Twister is a free to use, social media resembling twitter in every way, except it is based on a cryptic system of which no one can delete posts so no censoring can possibly occur. This is what we need the internet to be. The internet has replaced the mass medias role as the "Guard dog perspective" at least to some degree. This is why we are dependent on an open internet and can NOT afford the risks that comes with "Big Telecom's" proposal.

—Tommy Tangen, , me and the interweb R like this

—Tony Alfino, San Diego, CA

Big telecom will definitely charge more for its third class service if given the chance to do so. The US is behind several other developed countries when it comes to high tech telecom services. We invented and produce a great deal of optical fiber and the telecom companies have failed to use it to upgrade general service in America. They should not be given more power to charge more for bad service. They should improve service and bring America up to world standards.

—Ron Wilson, Sierra Vista, AZ

I am an educator working with young people to pursue their entrepreneurial talents and ideas. Most of their ideas involve access to the internet. By taking away Net Neutrality, you are taking away one more hope of our young people - not to mention entrepreneurs of all ages. Internet is awesomely powerful which is why the big corporations want to colonize it for their economic purpose which is not in accord with citizens. If this is all about notional missed sales under copyright law, then the tail is definitely wagging the dog.

—Sarah Mccloughlin, ,

This is very important to our Democracy!

—Edwin Holmberg Jr., LMSW, ACSW, Richmond, MI

My job depends on equal access to the internet. Our small company could not afford to compete with big corporations to pay for internet access and slow internet speeds would effectively put us out of business. The same is true for hundreds of thousands of small businesses all across America--and the world. It's like building public highways and then only letting rich people with Mercedes and BMWs drive on them!

Because big business shouldn't be able to control access to the internet based on who can pay the most.

—Tony Evington, ,

As an Internet user who believes strongly in the importance of a free and open Internet, I urge the FCC to reclassify broadband Internet access as a telecommunications service, and save Net Neutrality. In addition, the FCC should reject the proposed rules that would allow Internet service providers to divide the Internet into fast lanes for wealthy corporations and slow lanes for the rest of us.

The internet should never be control by just a few ... but rather, be available to all at reasonable costs. Any thought of charging tolls for premium access WILL NOT BE ACCEPTED BY THE PEOPLE!!!! ... PERIOD!

—Rob Fleming, , the internet has become a basic utility in modern society and should be regulated as such.

—Lucius Dionysus, milford, CT

In a truly democratic nation the voice of the constituents is supposed to mean something to the politician elected to represent their views and desires. Please vote for the best interest of the people as you promised you would - whether elected or appointed to office by those elected by the people. Anything less is fraud and treason. Please think about that.

free and open access to learning and sharing are an essential part of a democracy

—, Bloomington, IN

Information freedom is of utmost importance to the future of humanity. Destroying net neutrality and putting power into the hands of the few opens up many potential problems of censorship and exploitation. Do we really want a China style internet?

—Paavo Jumppanen, ,

Surely the country which considers itself the champion of democracy will not allow the throttling of the free & democratic internet.

—Mark Crosby, ,

The FCC should reclassify all the Internet service providers as "common carriers" and not allow Big Telecom to be able to charge steep tolls for premium access and block or slow down the websites or services to those who can not afford the new higher fees. It was to get a site and let advertising pay for the rest. Now the Big Telecom wants to rule the Internet Highway fast lane for those who want to pay their prices... No way keep it a neutral and open Internet under Title II to protect it's users.

—Mark Smith, San Diego, CA

Because it is the most basic requirement for a level playing field.

—Robbie Levin, ,

Open communications and open access with complete neutrality are cornerstones of a Democratic society. If people are denied openness, fairness and neutrality a new open internet with those principles will evolve to dethrone the old one.

The internet should remain net neutral . Corporations want to control and profit from anything that can be controlled and profited from . As long as they seek to try and get that control over the internet they will create for themselves less opportunities and profits . They will do themselves in and take a loss in profits in the long run . What is available to the public now on the internet , generates the profits for corporations that use the internet . If the Corporations were to start limiting what we can access and censor what is available to the internet they would see profits decline . The internet should be a neutral communications zone . Like what Antarctica is to the world so should the Internet be to the world .

Free speech

—Ken sale, ,

Big business needs to stop squeezing every dime out of the average consumer. This is just one more way for the rich to get richer on the backs of the average man. Additionally, the internet is a free speech medium. When we limit the internet as to what can be accessed and how fast, we're impacting free speech and expression. Please take action to stop this. It is not in the interest of the people of the U.S.

—Jason Mikel Boland, Tallahassee, FL

I use a wide range of Internet sites for work, study, and play, commercial and independent and everywhere in between. Any Internet policy which allows ISPs (or other corporate entities) to pick and choose which sites get priority for bandwidth will deal an irreparable blow to the Internet, for me and for millions of other users.

—Timothy Miller, Baltimore, MD

Net Neutrality is important to keep the internet equally available and affordable to all people .

—Malcolm Franke, ,

Giving corporations the power to shape the internet will only hinder its ability to shape our future for the better. It needs to stay open and free of the tampering that these changes would introduce.

—Adam Friedli, Wyoming, MI

If we want to reward stupidity and greed then proceed to support the undemocratic needs of unaccountable multi-nationals. This is another same as usual give the rich control over the majority for only their benefit. The world needs knowledge now more than ever as the threat of corrupt countries, business monopolies and ignorant terrorist extremists makes the open access of the Internet a strong tool in cleaning up corruption.

—Keith Wilson, ,

This is obviously a huge scam and the only winner is the cable companies (who basically already have a monopoly and barely provide decent service as is). I already pay enough for the crappy Internet I currently receive. Why then do you think for any second that I would be OK with having to pay more for the same crappy Internet.

—Raymond Acevedo, Huntington Station, NY

Net neutrality is a basic component of the principle of free speech and information.

—Susanna Purucker, Miami Beach, FL

Net Neutrality fosters competition which is good. If the FCC allows ISPs to break Net Neutrality, it will destroy to open Internet as we know it which is be seen as an attack on democracy. Make ISPs Common carriers so they can be regulated properly.

I am retired and don't think of myself as a technology dinosaur....so why should I have to settle for a s-l-o-w internet speed just because I'm on a fixed income and don't want to pay corporate prices?? Sounds like pure greed to me....and you know where that got us in the housing industry. Cut the crap, folks....just reclassify broadband providers as common carriers and let them compete fairly without gouging those able to handle the gouging. You know what they say about poking the bear.....take heed. Susan Rogers proud to be a Gray Panther

—Susan Rogers, Leesburg, FL

All Internet traffic should be treated equally, regardless of content or origin. We have net neutrality now—Internet traffic isn't sped up or slowed down, or blocked, based on what it is or where it came from. A small business' website loads at the same speed as large corporations. This has allowed small and non-profit websites to stay competitive with those backed by giant companies. And it has allowed for the rise of user-driven sites like Wikipedia and millions of blogs. Corporate greed never sleeps in America, but it should be kept away from the Internet.

—Roger Osborne, Redding, CA

Net neutrality is vital to the continued innovation and economic growth afforded by the open internet. The internet has changed the world, and attempting to stifle it to appease a handful of corporations would be a grave mistake. The internet was founded on the principles of free and open communication; please don't ruin one of our greatest successes through shortsighted policy that goes against the principles that the net was founded upon. Thank you.

—Brian Cutts, ,

Please do not segregate the internet. Like many Americans, I must get my access through a major telecom company. There is virtually no competition to control prices or customer service. For the majority of the time I have had my current service, which is through Cox, I have had connectivity problems. Since I live in an apartment building, I have no alternative but to use Cox, as they are contracted to my building. I find myself paying for a service that does not work, yet can do nothing about it. When I ask for refunds, it is denied. When I search the internet, I get my news from multiple independent news sources and blogs. These sites will be slower to load, and more difficult - perhaps impossible - to access, if these new internet rules are formalized. I do not want companies like Cox to control my content in the way they control my access now. I saw how Comcast blackmailed Netflix. Cable customers pay for the speed of their connection already. Comcast exploited their position to gather more in fees leaves me in no doubt they will do the same thing if they can exert financial control over the internet.

I don't want to have to pay more for the same level of bandwidth I currently have. I'm a support specialist, that means I need to be able to find solutions to problems ASAP, if I can't get information quickly because telecom companies decide they want to prioritize service to people who pay more yet are still using the same lines, then how am I supposed to stand a chance in today's terrible economy?

—Stephen Brace, Ormond Beach, FL

The FCC is facing the biggest public policy issue since 1934: access to the Internet. It should remain free and single-tiered with no differences between heavy corporate users and light residential users. Big Business should not have premium access compared to Small Business. The "playing field" must remain level. The inventor of the Internet, Tim Berners-Lee, urges Net Neutrality and recently stated, "An unrestricted web is vital to human development. Unless we have an open, neutral internet we can rely on without worrying about what's happening at the back door, we can't have open government, good democracy, good healthcare, connected communities, and diversity of culture."

—H Laver, Redwood City, CA

Decisions made in the USA affect us in Australia too. I loathe to see a small number of already wealthy people take advantage of others for their own greedy financial gain.

The whole reason that people like me don't watch TV is that TV is a vast wasteland of shows that I don't want to watch. If we let the big telecoms do to the internet what they did to cable TV then it will be the death of the internet.

—Allan Zabracki, ,

Karl Popper mentioned in "The Open Society and its enemies" the paradox of freedom. Absolute freedom leads to the disappearance of freedom because in absence of any control the powerful will abuse its power submitting others. Therefore, we people should unite, to oppose with our power the abuse of the few, and to protect the liberty of the majority. Francis Scott Fitzgerald said once that the only thing that differences rich people from poor people are that they have more money. They don't have better taste, more culture, more intelligence or more elevated concerns that the regular man. But they have more power. This is supposed to be an open society. We people should stand up together and prevent the powerful from controlling the access to the media they don't like. I want the FCC proposal to be stopped by the power of the people to preserve the Net Neutrality that an open society should have.

—Tomas Canales, ,

Net Neutrality allows me to learn and grow as a human being, to further my education. Ending Net Neutrality would set us as a people and nation back economically! We would lose out on innovation and many new startups, artists, inventors etc. Our, we the people paid through our taxes to create the internet structure! We as a people created the internet not the monopolistic telecoms! The End of Net Neutrality would be a devastating blow to the open internet! It would be another step in wealth inequality as a part of the larger picture of the society as a whole! Classify the internet as a common carrier! Protect the innovative power the internet! The world moves forward with high speed internet for all! The USA is going backwards in most categories with the return of the new gilded age of the 21st century and the new monopolistic corporations and robber baron families! The open internet is so important at this stage of its evolution to just hand over to the cable and telecom companies! Do the right thing reclassify the internet as a common carrier! So many people depend on free and open access to information regardless of income or political affiliation, and giving preference to some created a tiered system and leaves open the possibility that certain viewpoints will never be able to be expressed. This already takes place with major media, (tv,radio, newspapers), because of sponsorship, so the internet remains another outlet for free expression that could easily be suppressed without Net Neutrality.

I am an artist who relies on the internet for my livelihood. What I know is that corporate takeovers of utilities are NEVER for the good of the common person, but ALWAYS to enrich those who already have more than they could ever need. The internet is an extraordinary tool of Democracy, and we would be fools to believe any lobbyist or corporate officer who tells us it is for our benefit. They will censor things they don't like. They will put people like myself in the slow lane unless we cough up exorbitant amounts of money. The internet was invented by a private citizen, and research has been paid for by ordinary people via taxation. To me it verges on criminal to hand it over to corporate greed.

My husband and I get all our news and information about what is happening around the world through news sources from around the world. With Net neutrality we can do this. If it goes away we will only have access to what the service providers think should be in the fast track of the Internet. Also, I shop online. Many of the small dot com websites will disappear because they will be placed in the slow lanes which will make transactions difficult to impossible. The loss of many small businesses will have a negative impact on our economy. We need to maintain Net neutrality to have a healthy online retail experience.

—Gail B King, Oak Ridge, TN

Slow lane websites will wither and die next to the fast lane premium sites. The equality of the internet will be destroyed, and everyone will be poorer for it.

I'm a pensioner, live in the country and use the internet to keep in touch with family, friends and to shop. I won't be able to afford to keep in touch if restrictions to high speed service are put in place. There is also the question of privacy, it's easy to say if you have nothing to hide then there is nothing to worry about, but I don't want my information handed out to commercial interests and be targeted with ads, or potentially victimised by paranoid authoritarian governments and corporations. There is a continuous assault by big business and big government to force me into their pre-designed little congeries - where my individuality and my freedom of spirit are considered expendable for a bit more profit. The internet is an expression of my freedom. Please leave me with the little bit of freedom that I have left!

—Sharon McKinnon, ,

The internet is a level playing field when it comes to free expression, economic opportunity, and new innovative services. By creating a "fast-lane" of the internet, you will destroy all of these opportunities, destroy creativity and future services that could bloom.

—Steve Chapman, ,

—Andrew, ,

It is hard enough to pay current rates allowing major communications companies the ability to charge tiered rates is going to make it difficult for consumers to keep abreast of current affairs and meet daily business obligations. The internet should not be set to the advantage of the uber rich--it should be open to all. It should be regulated as a public utility or common carrier to insure fairness to all.

—Richard Lee, Zephyrhills, FL

I am a retired teacher and an invalid. Since writing is my field, and since the State of Illinois is suing to cut the pensions of all teachers who have been promised those pensions by the State of Illinois Constitution, I need the internet to work. I don't play games, I work on the internet.

—, Exeter, NH

Maintaining net neutrality is critical to prevent greedy robber baron telcos from charging money for services that add no value, except to their shareholders pockets.

—Nicholas Carman, ,

Chairman Wheeler: I am a retiree who lives on a lower than average fixed income. Generally no complaints for that, I chose this life all along by being first a Peace Corps Volunteer, and then in my last 20 years I helped create, and then led two non-profits that matched that financial description. There was also a 10-year stint working as a computer modeler preparing financial and marketing plans as part of a management team at the Park Avenue HQ of a Fortune 20 corporation. I have seen the arrival of MBAs and the shift in corporate ethics in the last half century, and much prefer my life for having taken an alternative route. See www.1wow.org for one of the two 501c3 programs. Your background in the communications industry is, I believe, at odds with the needs of the citizenry of the USA. We the people need an internet that continues to allow equality of browsing across all domains, without corporations interceding and bundling services/ setting filters to limit content based on some ability to pay. The current system was designed on taxpayer funds and is allowing an interactive exchange of ideas that holds open the creativity and breadth of experiences to see around and through the issues also abundant in this global society. Though retired, the internet has allowed me to continue to learn and to share my experience. That exchange now available to people is at threat of loss by the decision you are about to make. Despite all promises to the contrary, experience in TV, radio and print media repeatedly demonstrate that corporations will limit options whenever given the permission. Fees will proliferate. The poor and those with a fixed income such as me – we will lose our access to understanding and commenting upon issues. Please, hold open hearings. Listen to the voices of the citizens as a whole, and forgo relying so heavily on your corporate experience. People individually and our collective society needs your understanding and vote on our behalf. Sincerely,

—Rudy Sovinee, Escondido, CA

Because I use the internet every day. And I read a lot of scary science fiction.

We are a small business. We depend on the internet for creativity, entertainment, and business. please keep it free and open - don't give it to corporations to increase their profits, and to control and manipulate people.

Protect Freedom of Speech.

—Maja Gahr, Berlin,

I feel it's time we stand up to big telecom. We need to maintain a free and open internet for the people of the world. The USA built the internet to connect people and now it seems that we want to go backwards and make it a service that only the wealthy can afford. I feel that the FCC should be pushing the big tel-cos to expand the internet into more areas as well as rural areas so that farmers can have better access instead of trying to help big tel-cos get bigger and richer. It seems the FCC does not have the peoples interests in mind. Thank you

—Vince Faubert, ,

We all need to have unfettered, unencumbered, free access to the internet!

—Frederick Hamilton, Rancho Cucamonga, CA

Net Neutrality is modern day freedom of speech. If we limit it, we dilute what the USA stands for.

—Karen E Macrae, Litchfield, ME

we have rights too

—Bernadine Hoeft, Milwaukee, WI

I use the internet to teach online classes and it should be treated like a public utility. It should not be treated like a form of entertainment that can be price gouged by a handful of service providers.

—Arica Dawson, Holly, MI

The Internet is the most powerful communication tool available to us as citizens and users; we deserve an open and unbiased Internet that has become a defacto common carrier of out data communication.

—John Fitzpatrick, Springfield, VA

The internet would not be half as rich a resource and platform without Net Neutrality; in its early days, AOL and other portals tried to limit this neutrality and the results were embarrassingly feeble.

—Thomas Britz, ,

Access to open internet service is important to seniors on fixed incomes.

—Pat Geraghty, Altoona, WI

To Whom it May Concern, Please resist the attempts of large coroporations to further monopolize their hold on the internet and the traffic therein. It is the independent, noncorporate voices that make our democracy strong: these are the voices that will be silenced by the end of net neutrality.

—Lindsay Waterman, ,

The internet should remain free and open and not allow premium access to some information.

Just like the UK NHS..Net neutrality should be based on public need..not on ability to pay

—Stephen Barksby, ,

It is outrageous to think that big telecom companies can slow down the net for those who can't afford to pay up. The internet should be fair and equal for all who use it.

—Scott Matash, Macomb, MI

The internet was given to humanity as a gift. It is the most amazing and egalitarian phenomenon. It is a serious wrong to even consider changing that.

—Kathleen Cain, ,

Net Neutrality means everyone is on an equal playing field on the internet, both for the users and the creators. The moment this is unbalanced by something, say, a 'slow lane' it becomes unfair, where the rich and powerful can afford to keep up, and the poorer people, the small business who rely on the internet for sales, the people starting off on the internet will cripple. It is the equivalent of a car accident on a 3 lane motorway, causing backed up traffic to slowly move through one lane, one car at a time, it's frustrating, slow, costing fuel to sit on idle, your late for work and get in trouble with the boss, BUT if you pay a large fee that most couldn't afford, they might move you over onto another, quicker road in order to move forward, beautiful scenery along the way, you can wine and dine at the fancy restaurant and still be in time for work while everyone else is still slowly moving through one lane one car at a time. It's a hassle which affects the creator and the user, and only benefits the wealthy, and frankly, a pathetic attempt at Telecom to control the internet in its entirety.

—Hayden, ,

I am retired and on a low income. I use the internet for several hours daily and it is essential for my study and sharing with others interested in philosophical and religious ideas. It is unjust to further disadvantage those like myself already struggling economically and increase benefits to those who already have every advantage well above the majority.

Because I live in a rural area of the Sierra Nevada foothills in California and it's my vital link to the world!

—Jan Hansen, Somerset, CA

We've only begun to realize the immense power of the Net to transform our lives, so don't kill innovation now by letting the big telecoms get a stranglehold on it. If you do, they will stifle it.

The Internet is not the property of the ISPs as they behave like.. The term ISP is by definition a service provider and the rules are not theirs to make. By making a two tier system it not only gives a power of price for lower income folks it's a justification to raise and gouge the rest of us

Equal internet for everyone. Very reliable tool and the chance to gain thoughts and perspective on a variety of topics.

—Matthew Jerauld, Ithaca, NY

Nonprofits I support depend on net neutrality.

—Louis M. Smith, Mount Pleasant, SC

The internet is an essential public domain that must remain a universally accessible and unbiased space for all those wishing to enter, explore and interact within it. It is one thing to enable access and another to seek to exploit the provision of access as a means of discrimination for motive of profit or otherwise.

—Guy Cross, ,

The internet is one if the few places where people can innovate without paying the big bucks. The internet should be an even playing field.

A neutral internet is good for our democracy; eliminating that will only benefit big corporations like AT&T.

—Laura Strom, Los Angeles, CA

American tax payers paid for the developement of the internet. So why should people who don't use vidio streaming be or other commercial programs be delegated to snail mail. Our taxes paid for developing the internet so everybodp shouldy the same speed without extra charges.

—Russell Jurkovich, Joliet, MT

Everyone must have equal access. So vitally important to innovation!

—Annie Tordjman, ,

Net Neutrality is the only fair policy. To give anyone priority based on their ability to pay is not fair to start up companies and will crush the way business is done in this country. As a consumer I do not want to have slower service for all but a select few. Protect Net Neutrality!

Evens the playing field.

—, Tarzana, CA

The internet cannot be an incubator for innovation if traffic throughout it is throttled according to cash incentives, or more specifically, it can only innovate in that case in areas where sales and financial profit are concerned. Economics are undoubtedly important. Yet, much of positive learning and other greatly beneficial technological and intellectual progress ill fits with cash-centric physics. Until now, we have seen a flourishing human intellectual ecosystem. Innovation, and collaboration to create more innovation, has been rampant. This would not be possible without a level playing field across every site, every host, every user, every business. Unless you want to constrain and retard innovation in our future, you MUST enforce net neutrality.

—Nicholas Muir, Ithaca, NY

Fair Play, Democracy, All the wonderful things that create equality between rich and poor, educated or not. The Internet has created opportunity for us all to share, give, create, and discover what we have in common so as to bring mental and emotional richness to all society. How dare you all let greed for money and power destroy that.

—C Moriarty, ,

If the internet is allowed to be controlled by a few huge corporations, there will be a very heavy price paid by every small business in this country! If we can't be easily found, we loose business. Small businesses will fail. This can not be allowed to happen!

"The bottom line is" : the [inter-]net stretches, all the way "down under". One planet, third-rock-from-the-sun, it's all we've got, with amazing and wonderful variety of flora and fauna. Plus one unique variety, with no obvious logical reason for its existence : the human species. Sadly increasingly reducing humanity, mainly thru the actions and Kontrol of religions and Big Bucks (same difference...). Another example of "ANY-bloody-thing for money" ?. —Karl Pavloff, Cincinnati, OH

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.
—Matthew Pauze, ,

The average citizen need to have Net Neutrality. We are paying out more than we can afford now. Just Telephones, hard line and cellphones are almost $300.00. If you take away this right, you will be inundated with people on the streets protesting. I will take my wheelchair and be one of them.

Allowing ISPs to set the rate of a network built, developed and filled with content from all users is ludicrous.

—Drew Wood, Kelso, WA

The internet is a unique concept, it is one of the few things in our world that ignores borders, for the most part anyway. This uniqueness makes it all the more important that it retains fair and affordable access.

—Emmanuel vitulano, ,

Slow lanes will lead to an unfortunate dichotomy of non performing and performing companies online. Notice how Netflix is being bullied into paying more money by the ISP's.

—Michel Morin, ,

The rich can set up their own net anyway they want leave our net alone.

—James L Sellers, St.Louis, MO

Come on FCC, be an organization for the people JUST ONCE. Corporations should NOT be able to impinge upon the rights of free speech. Net neutrality hits right at the heart of what it means to be an American. The wealth of an individual nor an organization should not give any more credence to their voice nor opinion. PLEASE, read the first amendment of our constitution and realize that the little guys need protecting.

—Mr. Joshua Greene, Douglasville, GA

It is obvious why this is important. There should not be any form of hierarchy. We need to keep it equal for all. This is obviously just another way for corporations to make more big bucks.

—Rupert Cameron, ,

The fairest way to achieve net neutrality is if no one has an advantage over anyone else.
—Peter Turco, Westerly, RI

It would raise the prices of the sites I use, as they are soaked for more and more money to keep in the fast lane. As technology advances, these advances will mostly be applied only to the fast lane (as our phones did), while the slow lane slips farther and farther behind, until its just barely usable. I personally would have to give up some sites because of my income and age. This will hurt my quality of life. Just so an already succesful set of companies can increase their stock worth. It's not right. Thats why we have the FCC, and a government, and a society, to protect our citizens from those who wish to lower our quality of life, just for personal gain. Thank you,
—Cleo Smith, san luis obispo, CA

It's not broke, therefore no need to fix it.
—Montell Qualls Jr., Grove City, OH

Net Neutrality is at the core of cultural and information exchange. It's fundamental to what makes the internet so essential and integral to everything we do. To take away the neutrality is to sell off control of the internet to private interests to the detriment of society, and stifle progress on so many fronts.
—Andrew, ,

The internet depends on net neutrality to allow for innovation of it's wild array of uses. Allowing content to be discriminated by ISPs opens the door to censorship and abuse.

Net Neutrality is extremely important to me

—Sharon Fraser, Owings Mills, MD

The Net belongs to the people and not for sale to the corporations.

—Jerry Matsui, Seattle, WA

The internet is as much a public utility as sewer and water. As the Arab Spring showed, internet access is vital to the exercise of free speech. If it is made available to only those who can afford it, then you may as well burn the Constitution.

—Mary Kuchera, Rockville, MD

It's important to me, because it's important to my family, it's important me because that's our primary means of communications. It's important to me because my mom is taking her first entrepreneurial steps. The kinda that can easily be quashed because media conglomerates are trying to erode regulations for the sake of 'faster' internet for those with the most money, media conglomerates. It's actions like this that can cripple the way we communicate and the way the we make money because the economy and massive companies like Comcast have forced people, for better or for worse, into a corner. A corner we soon wont even be able to pay for, let alone ever get out of.

—Nicolas Di Lollo, ,

The Internet is part of the way I do work and how I spend my free time. It is a crucial part of the way I live my life, the method of my employer, and everyone I know. It is essential to day to day business and play.

Leave the internet alone! It works fine without interference from government and government bureaucrats!

—Herman Stanford, Poplarville, MS

The reason Net Neutrality is important to me, is because we don't need terrible giant telecoms telling us to pay a fee or get thrust into the slow lane. That is not right at all. That's tyranny at best. When the founding fathers first wrote the Constitution, it was written specifically to avoid these kinds of things. And in the years since the Internet was opened to the public, many, many businesses have made lots of money, innovation has skyrocketed and all in all it's been great for all parties. But now the linchpin of the Internet, are deciding that we should have to pay another bullshit fee. It's gotten absolutely insane. Please, FCC, the Internet has become, for the most part, a utility. I mean, you wouldn't want your power been capped at a tiny KW/h value, now would you?

—Solomon Bolden, Birmingham, AL

We need to keep the net neutrality for economic fairness and information freedom for now and the generations to come. We do not need to sell the commons so that a few companies can make money at the cost of the freedom of the average American. It is shocking to see how now a days the people who run these companies the only guiding principle is just money. Not the pride of providing value and making money by providing solution to problems that help society as a whole. They do not have a problem making money by taking advantage and harming the American society as a whole. I hope you do not let it happen.

—Yadranka Grgurevic, Annandale, VA

I am a disabled person on Social Security, which is a limited small income. The internet is my only outlet for information, and bill paying. Cable is so expensive now if it goes up again I am left in the dark.

The fast lane will destroy access for people with less money to access valuable online information.

—Christopher bohn, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me because I have two teen daughters, and I want to see them grow up in a world of free expression and innovation. Telecom and Cable have virtual monopolies now, there is NO reason to give them more power, or access to new fees and charges.

—Douglas Liberati, Springfield, IL

Please do not let Comcast, Time Warner, AT & T, Verizon, and other telecoms control access to the Internet. The Internet is the most democratizing media ever and should not be allowed to be controlled by for-profit institutions of any kind.

We all need the internet not just those who can afford to pay a higher price.

—Corrine Molling, Onalaska, WI

As a daughter of deceased parents, who worked in the mathematical and library sciences, I believe very strongly that information in Internet form should remain a free and available service for anyone who wishes access to it. To take that away by slapping a price and slow response periods is completely an evil, unacceptable thing to do. Information, in whatever form it takes should be there for anyone who needs it. Please do not bow down to Telecom's demands, and do what your common sense is telling you to do. You could be responsible for the chaos that ensues if Internet users are cut off from the information they need.

—Eliza Tague, ,

Almost daily, I use the Internet to transact business and contact people throughout the world. The Internet long ago ceased to be a plaything for techies, scientists, and PhD's. It is critical to everyday life for most of the citizens in this country, as well as the advanced nations of this world. Recall how bold and decisive was the FCC's decision to declare the airwaves a free medium, open to everyone. You stand at the brink of a similarly insightful, decisive, and momentous decision. The Internet was not established to create monstrously wealthy and oppressive corporations. From the start, it was conceived as a medium that would be open and unhindered to all. To declare it anything but a public utility, unfettered by corporate despotism, would brand you as incredibly lacking in foresight and statesmanship. All the people need all of the Internet. We support it and pay for it. We should not be left out of this equation, because we are, ultimately, the largest factor in it.

—Louis Mueller, Indiantown, FL

If The current Big Players of the Internet have their positions frozen at the top by this bad decision; The Internet will freeze too. Thereafter the innovation will move to more just & enlightened countries & the US will lose another of it's world leading positions. Competition is supposed to be the lifeblood of Capitalism; Why are you passing Socialist, Anti-Competitive rules that will hurt Small American Business? The Big Internet service providers CLAIM they won't slow down ordinary internet traffic but all the independent experts say they are lying & I believe them.

—Sterling Sharp, Susanville, CA

Give the internet back to the people.

—Micah Bettis, Lake St Louis, MO

In canada, rgers, bell and telus already own all the internet infrastructure granting them enough power. This is a benefit to no one but the telecommunications companies themselves. I as an internet user receive no benefit from them providing a "fast lane" to those who can pay for it.

—Erica Miller, ,

You already know the right thing to do here. The Internet is only the Internet if it can be used by everyone, with equal access, unencumbered by the whims and greed of the communications companies.

Classify ISP's as common carriers!

—Chris Pitzel, Simi Valley, CA

The power of the open internet today is it's unprecedented capacity to inform on a vast array of subjects at the touch of a key board. For example, in June of 2008 I provided overwhelming evidence of the impending 2008 stock market crash from various credible sources that I was able to find on the open internet at no cost and had followed for over 3 years prior to the that event. As a result of my efforts, my audience saved themselves from huge losses when the actual market crash took place 3 months later. Meanwhile, none of this information was to be found anywhere in the the Main Stream Media which, in my opinion, continues to control and distort news sources primarily for the same reasons as those who seek control of the open internet. In fact, because this is so blatantly obvious, I do not use any MSM news sources in order to understand what is going on...in the US or anywhere else in the world. Now imagine what will happen if we lose the open internet.

—Tom Pickens, Danville, CA

Content should be up to the consumer, information should not be given only if premiums can be paid by both sides.

—James Roadknight, ,

The internet connects all of us in our increasingly globalized world, it allows us to communicate with each other and learn about different cultures. By creating fast and slow lanes and allowing certain content to be interfered with, the diversity of the net would be greatly reduced and its neutrality compromised. At the expense of all of us. Further, I, personally, do not believe that a single country on its own has the right to decide over something that spans across the globe. Thank you for your consideration.

—Carmen, ,

Creativity and innovation needs freedom to prosper and so does mankind!

—Mariska postma, ,

Above all other concerns, blocking, speed-throttling, and other forms of sabotage to attack competition totally destroys a technology's credibility as a press platform, as well as severely restricting its commercial trustworthiness. Lack of Title II classification will cause the fair and open Internet originally envisioned to die a slow death at the hands of an ever-increasing tangle of localized restrictions, caveats, and protection rackets run by telecom companies. These obstacles will seriously affect the basic structure of the Internet, and could at thier most damaging create a series of balkanized networks operated entirely by monopolies and loosely connected by a handful of slow, expensive, content-blocking interlinks. Net neutrality protections are the only real way to prevent such abuses. If your phone company charged extra to call phones on other carriers lines, you would complain. If your phone company decreed that all calls outside the country would be one-way in the interest of 'not serving traffic they don't make money off of', you would think it ridiculous and never take them seriously again. Don't be fooled by the same requests in a different media.

Access to the internet should be a level playing field, and not given to those that pay large amounts for premium access, nor should the big players have the ability to throttle the smaller players down in favor of their customers.

—Ted Shore, ,

The internet has been built up by many people over the years with a lot of effort and enjoyed by all users to learn, become informed, speak out and be entertained. It is universal and useful to everyone and that is how it should remain. You can't take something away that is not technically yours. It is everyone's used for all kinds of reasons so to charge huge fees many people who need it will be deprived and that is extremely unfair.

A free open internet is an essential element in a healthy democracy,

—Bernie Butler, Dartmouth,

Enough is enough! The current FCC proposal unacceptable. Net neutrality has created the vitality which the FCC so applauds. So do not make ridiculous cynical attempts to fix that which is NOT BROKEN!!

—Eli Pepper, Croton on Hudson, NY

The internet is today's public square. A public square is a level place where any voice has equal access to be heard. If net neutrality is cast aside for greed and power, much like the public square be violated by raw power, the internet will forever lose the elemental democratic fairness it currently has. Once destroyed this utilitarian democratic social construction will be gone, irrevocably lost to corporate greed. Our free society will be diminished in ways that will have both immediate impact, with the individual's voice drowned out by monopolistic media. In the long term the extent of the domination of big media will likely overwhelm the individual citizens. The implication for political domination by the rich, and corporation they control. I believe that the proliferation of propaganda will go unchecked, further concentrating power, and diminishing anything resembling a free and democratic United States. The loss of net neutrality is be a unmitigated disaster. As an university academic reference librarian I can't imagine a more dangerous decision to get wrong. There is no argument that can be made to justify abandoning net neutrality.

—Russ Gladstone, Danbury, CT

Freedom of Speech and uncensored exchange of ideas would likely end, as providers could block information of sites whose content they don't agree with.

Net Neutrality keeps everyone on a level playing field. As we all know, segregation is a bad policy on any level, and abandoning Net Neutrality will allow already too-powerful media corporations to become gatekeepers of our (the public's) Internet in order to enrich themselves and screw the rest of us.

—, Denver, CO

we don't need a tiered system where a few can control all

—Bobby Locke, Gainesville, FL

Net Neutrality ensures everyone is at the same level. A small business is represented the same as a large business. Without this ability capitalism will be lost. We will have only large businesses being represented on the internet. This will reduce competition and hurt the consumer. If the Internet is subject to this policy it will destroy what it is. Maybe even to the point that online commerce will be reduced or eliminated. Are we trying to undo what we've built in the last 20 yrs?

The internet has become a key service to all Americans and should not be made the property of a select few.

—John Herlihy, Taylors, SC

All cable companies try to sell bundles with VoIP telephone service as a part of it for an outrageous fee. If you let them decide how to regulate themselves, the first thing they will ban is all other VoIP services like the one I use. I pay only a few dollars each month, and due to it being VoIP I do not qualify for the various federal subsidies to cover the cost, but it is still less than it would be with the subsidies and the crazy prices cable companies already demand. The FCC regulates ALL telephone carriers. The only exception is cable companies. They mysteriously have a free pass. If you do not do your job and reign in the Internet as a whole as a common carrier, then you are traitors seeking to destroy the American way of life.

—Bradley Hicks, Fort Worth, TX

We need to keep up with the rest of the world. This country would never have progressed as it did if we had not treated other utilities with the importance they deserve. Let's not move backwards with internet access.

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Mr. Major E Magwood, Las Vegas, NV

Without net neutrality all consumers become subjected to the ads/perspective of those who pay. In effect, the deepest pockets get access to consumers.

I want free and open competition on the Internet as opposed to the disaster of Cable Television where your policies of monopolies for each neighborhood in the United States has led to total disaster and your decision to allow Americans to be screwed and locked into one cable provider based on their place of residence which more often than not act as total dictators in their area. Where I live Charter Cable even pays off my local municipality not to regulate whatever behavior they

—Elizabeth Scheppler, Arlington, TX

Equal access and speed is best for both customers and businesses. That's what other developed nations are doing, and the evidence is clear. It's also essential for international and local communication. Open communication is the bedrock of freedom and democracy. To sum up: it's the right thing to do.

—Beata Riedlmayer, Chicago, IL

Internet services flow like water and are a utility. There should not be any interference in delivery or choices. Thank you.

—Virgene Link, Anacortes, WA

Keeping an open an accessible internet to all is a defining moment in our humanity as we become a more interconnected planet. Net neutrality will ensure people from all walks of life are granted the same information, transmission speeds and freedom of speech to express their voice in the global arena and share new ideas while learning from those in the global community. Carriers/ Providers are just that - carriers of the information. They did not create this marvelous tool nor should these select corporate few be able to dictate its quality and service. The end users are the true content creators - and by limiting the individual's ability to create and express you are single handed impacting the fate of humankind and it's ability to collaboratively communicate towards the betterment of our existence

The cost of internet broadband service in the USA is excessive, and I am deeply concerned that if net neutrality is not preserved, free and equal access will be further compromised. Access to content produced by independent providers without the financial means to pay for a "fast lane" also will be problematic. I thus endorse reclassification of broadband providers as common carriers under Title II.

NO ONE should "own" ANY airwaves in the ENTIRE range of electromagnetic "spectrum". This is like saying someone OWNS the ENTIRE OCEAN! Or maybe even AIR!!! MOST(!!!!!!!!!!!!!) countries (including the USA) JAM information about what is REALLY happening. The FCC probably has very good intentions for the most part, but THEY need to REMEMBER that their job is to let ALL citizens have the RIGHT to be HEARD!!! ANY politician who listens to/accepts gifts from ANY lobbyist or gets money from ANY "PACS" is ALMOST CERTAINLY guilty of TREASON!!!!!! I don't think this is fair to small enterprise, non lucrative organisms or web sites that offer free services to users. This will limit creativity and opportunity only to those who have the means or the corporate size. There is already an increase in the gap between upper and the middle class and in most countries why pushing this concept to a service that was mostly equalitarian for every users and service providers.

—Bruno Sylvain, ,

You know why it's important. We need to keep it free for everyone. We've privatized much too much already. Not the Internet, too.

—Barbara Dahms, Flint, TX

I use the internet DAILY. I would be frustrated, irritated, and angry if you decide to cave in to the big money and make my life more difficult by providing me with slower service than big money (not even dark money--they're right out in public!) can give to big payers. As my government, I'm supposed to be able to trust you to look out for me, the "little guy." Please do so!

—Norman Jemison, ,

Revolution should be less violent.

—Diane Pitzel, San Diego, CA

Internet costs are already well above what they should be, especially in smaller country towns - like where I live. There is no reason for this. If this "Slow Lane" proposal goes through, many people, like me, won't be able to afford to use the internet. That means less customers. If it's too expensive, people won't want to use their precious data allowance as freely as they do now - which will in turn affect every online business around the world.... just so a few greedy giants get a bigger slice of a pie they didn't even bake. Please reject this proposal.

—Mark White, ,

It keeps a level field of healthy commerce copetition, thereby keeping access available to everyone equily regarless of their means.

Next we will be paying for fresh air - the NET should be kept free!!!

—Charlotte Mullen, Howell, NJ

Net neutrality is important to all mankind. It is at the very foundation of the development of our species. If we are to survive and thrive we must be able to communicate our ideas, concepts, philosophies and spirituality freely around the world. The internet gives us that opportunity. The internet was not not invented or developed by big telecom, it is not theirs to control. Please reclassify broadband carriers as common carriers and protect net neutrality.

—Richard Brant, ,

Net Neutrality is essential to the future of our very democracy. We, the people, paid for the very development of the Internet. We, the people -- not profit-driven private entities -- should decide how it is accessed. Please scrap your current proposal; please preserve our democracy; please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers.

—Allan Fix, Albany, CA

The internet is a means of communication that every person should have equal access to; limiting its access would mean discriminating against those who are in a more vulnerable position, and taking advantage of them.

The internet is not another cable channel. It is for information, education, entertainment and more. If different tiers of service is allowed, it will be the first step of censorship. The broadband providers must be classified as common carriers, to keep them from blocking or creating inferior service or interfering with websites.

—Joe Niffen, Minneapolis, MN

It would be outrageous to turn the internet into a tollroad for the commercial carriers! Have they influenced the FCC via the political process "follow the money!""? Net Neutrality is important so everyone has equal access and rights. We do not want freedom of speech and access diminished by the powerful media organisations.

—Notburga Pilgrim, ,

Dear Chairman Wheeler - like countless others, I depend on the internet both for my livelihood and for my ongoing education about current events and information of all kinds. I am utterly opposed to any company having the power to prioritize internet content in any way! Not only would it be an egregious violation of Freedom of Speech for ISPs to be able to speed up or slow down access to internet content at their (financially-motivated) whim, but I believe this would completely degrade the quality of the internet, and leave us a much poorer society intellectually as a result. I support Net Neutrality 100% - as does every single person I know - and I urge the FCC to support it 100% as well. Thank you, Monica Firely

—Monica Firely, Sarasota, FL

Big money business should not be favoured over small businesses and the American public when utilizing the public utility of the internet.

—Wendell F Perks Jr, Interlaken, NY

As a physician with a small private practice I use websites to help me with billing, because it is terribly cost ineffective for me to buy an electronic medical record service. The website I use allows me to electronically bill insurance companies for NO CHARGE. However, if they will be charged to offer these services, then they will pass those charges on to the physicians that use them. Then I have to, in turn, pass the charges on to my patients, and I can no longer afford to use sliding scales for economically disadvantaged patients. This is just ONE small reason why net neutrality is critical to maintain, and why it is important not to let internet service providers impose fees. Many academics also rely on the use of the internet for their research and sharing of ideas, and this would be jeopardized because small select websites will not be able to survive if fees are imposed.

—Mary Catherine Wimer, Charlottesville, VA

For the reasons stated above. It is very important in my daily life and the lives of millions of others.

—Dorothy Holtzman, Lakewood, NJ

Having carriers determine what content is favored over others takes the right from the people to decide what information they should access and putting that in the hands of corporations and other interests and dilutes the rights of the individual.

—Misty McIntyre, Alameda, CA

The Internet has become one of the most important tools that regular people have for expressing themselves in a world where politics is dominated by money and power. Further, it is the primary venue for new and innovative ideas to be turned into businesses. Net neutrality is essential to small businesses in the modern era.

—Ian VanWyhe, Portland, OR

This issue is bigger than the US--the Internet is world-wide, but the US must be a leader in keeping all components of the Internet accessible and affordable to all.

—Patsy Price, ,

Whenever corporations or governments have monopolistic or oligopolistic control of any enterprise, it becomes a vehicle for political or profit purposes only. Net Neutrality guarantees equal access and bandwidth to all users, resulting in a stronger economy, more entrepreneurship and far more positive collaboration amongst creative users that benefits all who use the net, not just a few. If Net Neutrality doesn't matter, the net will become Feudalistic, with only the .01% benefitting at the expense of all other users. The net began as a neutral research tool...keep it that way.

—Bruce McLeod, ,

This service must be protected as an equal access utility for the common good!

It's not acceptable that any human being exercise dominion over another by curtailing his/her freedoms and by limiting his/her access to information. Being human must be the birthright that enables all of us to delve and explore anything in the realm of human experience and intellect. Our progressive evolution depends on it. The profits of a few are not consequential to the future prospects of humankind.

I earn my living over the internet and the prospect of paying per unit of data to bottleneck sucking leeches like comcast, ATT, verizon and time-warner is hugely offensive! Make them behave like what they are: Common carriers.

—Lucas Klein, Hong Kong,

I don't want the Internet Service Providers to increase their rates, as we already pay enough for the services which are being provided to us. Please classify the ISP's as common carriers, which will insure we as the consumers don't have to pay inflated prices for the services which we already pay a pretty penny for.

—Thomas Sloan, Cataula, GA

I use the internet every day for so many things that are the heart and soul of so many things I do in life. I use it to shop for things online, check my bank statements, watch steaming videos, earn points on sites from Sony Rewards and My Coke Rewards to spend on things in their online malls, I can send family pictures to someone, I get emails alerting me of upcoming meetings, and the list goes on and on and on. I mean it!!! Protect Net Neutrality NOW!!!!!!!!!!

—David Broden, Framingham, MA

Open communication on the internet promotes democracy and fosters creativity. The internet should not be controlled by large corporations who limit free expression of ideas and select who gets priority.

—Paula Fox, Golden Valley, MN

It is a public utility!

—Max Campbell, Newbury Park, CA

Stop gauging the public and giving the telecom companies more power than they already have.

—Bruno Da Costa, ,

As an internet user I enjoy content from all sources not just the large corporations that can afford to pay extra costs to provide content. There are already costs involved with maintaining websites and allowing already powerful and monopolistic telecom companies to benefit further is a major attack on all internet users. Therefore I urge you to classify all internet service providers as common carriers and reinstate common carriage as a policy. This will further encourage innovation and investment. Yours faithfully Garth Sullivan

—Garth Sullivan, ,

Net Neutrality is essential - and given the high prices we pay for net access in this country (so much for the illusion of competition) I fully expect equal access throughout the net and to be free of bottlenecks and barriers. Don't destroy the very essence of what has made the internet prosper.

—Gene Turner, janesville, IA

Senator Bernie Sanders put it best: Net Neutrality is the First Amendment issue of the 21st century. Allowing TPP or any similar bill to take affect will effectively muzzle free speech, holding it hostage to greed.

—Patricia G. Gerresheim, West Shokan, NY

The airways belong to ME and the rest of MY FELLOW CITIZENS. Yes, that is a shout-out to say to you (the FCC) that you have gifted OUR property to enrich the two brothers who own Comcast and the few others who own the other pipes, not to mention the ownership of the content transmitted over the pipes. Do you care? Probably not, but I do, and many others like ME care quite a lot. WE will use what power we have to get OUR property back - but in the meantime . . . do not approve the rules that force US to fight to take back what is OURS in the first place. Please reclassify the Internet as a telecommunications service. I already have problems with Internet connectivity and my provider suggests that I should pay more (than I can afford) to increase my bandwidth. Since my provider already limits my "free" access and as Internet content increases its access requirements there will only be more costs to the consumer. We will simply be priced into oblivion. No access will be possible. The Internet is supposed to be owned by the public but it seems "you" have the power to "gift" the Internet to profit making corporations. Please reconsider what you are about to do. Thank you.

—Barbara Hoch, McConnelsville, OH

It's my livelihood, my continuing education, my citizen activism, and my link to many of my friends and colleagues. I can't do without it, and I believe that as an American citizen, it is my right.

—Michelle Gale, Coconut Creek, FL

The internet should be the same as a Public Utility with no perks or favoritism for any users whether they are a corporation or poor household. Too much everyday life for the average person is conducted via the internet. I pay bills, keep in touch with family, find important information I need, keep track of prescriptions and medical care and needs. It is imperative to have internet access to even apply for most job positions now days. Things people do on the internet on a daily basis have become the most common way to accomplish so many tasks that I believe it would cause undue harm to the majority of the population if a premium is put on the use of the internet. It should remain open to all and free of privileged exceptions. Extremely Important!!

—Susan Davis, Kennewick, WA

Net neutrality is as important as freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

—Bill Shaw, ,

I am a Viet Nam veteran trying to live on social insecurity. The Net makes it possible for me to live on this low income. I can pay my bills over the Net and not have to make a 100 mile round trip to the closest town. If the fees go up any more I will not be able to make ends meet. I do not make enough to move to town and pay the high rents there (I own my trailer where I live now, and cannot afford to buy a house in town). The Net is the last freedom of speech and exchange of ideas left in this country.

—David Blakeman, Dolan Springs, AZ

—Mark Hofferma, Indianapolis, IN

Net neutrality is important to me because I use the internet and most of my use would not be fast lane. I spend considerable time reading and responding to e-mails. My time is valuable and if each e-mail is slowed down I will not be able to get through each days mail. ISP providers must not be allowed to treat some sites differently than others.

—Theo B. Giesy, Norfolk, VA

Net Neutrality is important to me because fairness is important to me. I am sick & tired of everything being bought & taken over by the rich. Enough already!

—Cher L. Johnson, Eden Prairie, MN

The Internet is a highway for free communications. Allowing any major ISPs to ramp up costs and throttle "the little guy" will tear apart the fabric that has sustained the great advantages that have made the Internet such a level playing field for everyone, big, small and inbetween. DON'T CREATE A "FAST" LANE! It will mean only that there is NOW a slow lane!!!

Equal access is important for a free internet.

—Matthew Milberry, ,

The fantastic growth of the internet and it's increasing importance in daily life around the globe come greatly from the fact that it is an "open" playing field. The huge multi-national corporations essentially do not have a leg up on the innovative individual and the myriad of fantastic ideas that were once dreams of a few, have become commonplace factors in our life. No where else does this happen in today's competitive environment, and it should be plainly obvious to see why caving in to Big Telecom interests in the fashion proposed would only serve to further line their gold-filled coffers and allow more runaway consolidation and preferential treatment for a few, at the creative expensive of many. It's not too late to stand up to these special interests and remind them a little about law. At the end of the day, they must know that you mean business and won't allow further changes to the internet that they have dreamt up to push aside fair access to grow their electronic fiefdoms. Do something right for the internet and the reputation of the United States and maintain Net Neutrality. We've already seen how giving corporations like Comcast "a little edge" now has them trying to bully Federal Agencies. I've certainly had enough of this type of behavior and I assume (and hope) that you have too!

—James Dunfrund, Pleasanton, CA

I don't want my favorite sites slowed down just because of the whim of my Internet provider, or speeded up because of what a particular company pays. Keep the Internet neutral.

—Bonnie Warford, Prescott, AZ

Keep small businesses competitive. It drives creativity and better products.

—Garrett Larson, Orlando, FL

The Internet is like breathing fresh air after watching TV. It is free and open, and not subject to monopolistic practices or dominated by a few for-profit companies or corporations. It is important to keep the Internet open and free, and neutral to all its users. Otherwise, tragically, we will lose its great ability to be a voice for all people and a medium for all people's ideas and information, art, music, culture, and communication. The vast power and potential of the Internet will be fettered and reduced to a shell of what it was if net neutrality is taken away and for-profits are allowed to take it over and dominate it and start charging more for it. It is, by its nature, a natural monopoly and must be regulated to be kept free and open to the people who use it and need it -- not allowed to be a tool for making more money by those who do not care about its vast power for good and for local, national, and international communication and understanding, as well as the sharing of information and ideas.

—Angela Bellacosa, Seattle, WA

I love the internet! It's full of boundless information and learning. Money-grubbing politicians need to back off!

Net neutrality is important to spur on creativity and invention, common carrier designation for these overblown corporations is imperative for our very ideals to survive. When Henry Ford invented the assembly line all other competitors had to adapt, urban stable owners needed to adapt. History is full of businesses that perished or adapted and survived but Democracy is not meant to impede progress.

—Craig Olivier, ,

—Toby Moum, Monument, CO

Corporatism undually influences much of our society today. We feel its sting in the marketplace and its bite at the gas pump. It is important that the Internet remain free from the toxic influence of corporate greed and lack of integrity.

—Sam Sloneker, Joshua Tree, CA

It is pure greed that drives the concept of a "tiered" internet, coupled with disdain for democracy and unfettered access for all. We must reclassify broadband providers as common carriers!

—Arlene Kanno, Wisconsin Dells, WI

I am poor & disabled. My Easter Seals computer is wonderful, but I struggle to pay for internet access as it is. I need to be able to get information I need,& I don't like my choices being limited by ISP's because I can't afford more money.

—Linda Bormuth, Boston, MA

Net neutrality is, in this day and age the only guarantee for freedom of speech and thought.

—Adrian Rogers, Gawler South,

The FCC's "fast lane" proposal implements de facto censorship on the internet by establishing a pay-for-play policy. Those who cannot pay what will certainly become higher and higher costs and fees to distribute content will be silenced. I am completely aghast that you are proposing this. I demand that the net remain open and neutral.

Net Neutrality is what keeps the internet moving. It's how David winning against Goliath has become commonplace. To keep the internet a platform for innovation, we cannot let giant companies get spa headstart versus start ups.

—Tom LeBlanc, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me, because without it, newcomer sites and businesses will suffer, and opinions deemed unfavourable by people in power could easily be silenced simply because they have money. This idea will create oppression in one of the last true harbinger's of freedom, the Internet.

—Tyler Landry, ,

A free internet is the best way to promote democracy throughout the world and bring positive change to supressed people everywhere

Without Net Neutrality you have no internet. Period. You squash small business enterprise, independent art, small inventors, and virtually all of the grassroots innovation that the internet currently makes possible. To take that away is a step BACKWARD, not a new and clever innovation. Anyone who doesn't get that is living in 1985.

Net neutrality is important to me because it gives everyone a level playing field for the distribution of information. Instituting a two tiered system that benefits large companies is not the will of the people. Net Neutrality is very important to me and my business. I guess we need two different lanes for trains and planes-one for the wealthy and one for all the others. When is this giving to the wealthy, powerful, and corporations going to stop. I am so disappointed in America.

—Janet McKinney, Bow, WA

Freedom, liberty, opportunity, the value of a human being, these are things the United States used to be very good at, revered around the world in fact. Sadly, as with all things the concentration of money and power chips away at these values. In the current case we are faced with what has been brilliantly and accurately described as a "corporate kleptocracy", huge corporations rampaging across society at large taking from the public space what they can. It is worth remembering that the internet has never been about the importance of the corporations flogging there wares, but always about the individual and the things one can do with freedom and liberty. Worth saving wouldn't you think? Preferential treatment of those with money at the expense of the rest of us does not sound very 'neutral' does it? Regulatory authorities exist for a reason, and acting as proxies for the entities that they are supposed to regulate at the expense of the consumer is not it. Simply put: are you complicit in this transparent corporate cash-grab or are you going to do your job?

—Andrew MacDonald, ,

I want freedom of expression

—Morgan Roman, Honolulu, HI

Net Neutrality has allowed for an explosion in creative thought and the sharing of ideas unequaled in human history. Our children and grandchildren deserve to reap the benefits of this new era of free and open access to information and knowledge, just as we have.

—Gregory Gainer, Owings Mills, MD

Honesty, Truth, and Equality! Anything else is criminal!

—Taylor Finch, Phoenix, AZ

I think all data should have the same priority

—Ross Johnson, ,

The internet is a powerful tool for free expression because it is readily available to the common people. We must not change that. To do so undermines the purpose of the internet to connect people regardless of their differences.

—Joseph Catubig, ,

I support an unrestricted uncensored free flow of information.

—Tod Mirgis, ,

We want a neutral in the Internet rather than corporations making it a new source of income for them.

—Carlos Verdecia, Miami Beach, FL

If the US slows down, the world slows down.

—Alex Danielewicz, ,

I am a US citizen. It is (and continues to be) unfair when large monied interests buy control. Don't allow it.

—Jeff Christopherson, ,

As a small business operator, I require broad efficient access to promote adn develop my business.

—Robert Hunter, ,

Readily available information is important for our freedom. Big business and governments don't want this, therefore free internet access is paramount.

—Heinz Huxholl, ,

The richest among us should NEVER be the only people with a voice that can be heard. Keep the internet equal.

—A Gould, Flagstaff, AZ

Freedom to communicate is the best form of a true democracy.

—John Warren, ,

The net must remain neutral, our freedoms and democracy depend on it!

—Max Nohel, ,

This would be one more step in taking away freedom of speech, freedom of expression and creativity. It would empower the mighty at the expense of the many, of the poorer, of those who would never otherwise have a voice.

—Daphne Williams, ,

because the internet is for free thinkers not for corporate criminals to run. Don't be a part of giving away our rights. Each and every person in the FCC is a part of the world so they have to be a part of keeping our freedoms and not keeping the keys to our chains! Wake up!

—Tony Assassin, ,

Net neutrality has been the mainstay of my career. I worked for the largest provider of Novell technology (including UnixWare, Linux, and web servers) into the Federal Government, when the internet was made available to the mass public. That public now assumes, as an article of faith, the government will protect the neutrality of this vast communications system. Please do not let them down. David Lawson

—David Lawson, Phoenixville, PA

The internet, like any library, should have no restrictions and should never be allowed to be controlled by a single organization as to what they say we can see. Punishment for restricting the internet like this... it's a capital offence.

—Robert Heckadon, ,

Anything less than absolute net neutrality will result in de facto censorship, period!

—Chuck Slade, Albuquerque, NM

The Internet is part of the Commons. It belongs to everyone equally. Those who have more money should not be able to get better, faster access.

—Nancy Wagner, Bothell, WA

The cost of internet access in Canada is already too high. As an educator I want to see free of access to the internet. ME

—Maynard Embree, ,

Internet Users do not need or want others to block web sites or regulate what content is appropriate. That is censorship! People can Self-censor as they wish. The expression of ideas should NEVER be SUPPRESSED by any third party!

—Michael, ,

Until ISPs can deliver a standard quality of bandwidth that is on par with the much of the rest of the developed world, they shouldn't try to dictate terms of its use to us. I have had the same ISP for 15 years, yet the service options and speeds with them have barely budged in that time. Even then, I find it distasteful that they would try to exploit the internet for even more money, but I'm not surprised by it. They are an industry, and unregulated, business always does exploitative things. So, do your job FCC, and regulate the industry before it exploits us to criminal levels.

—Alan Miller, Bainbridge, NY

Everyone deserves the same. To do otherwise would undermine human rights.

—Sarah Balitsky, ,

The Internet is the greatest advancement for the promotion of Freedom of Speech since the U.S.A. made their Declaration of Independence which sparked one the greatest migrations of people searching for a way to express them selves without fear of retribution.

—Jerrold Grande, ,

I use it everyday to stay up on news, politics and issues of the day. I believe it is absolutely necessary for the continuation of our democracy. It is much easier for me to stay informed today than it was before the advent of the internet. I can share ideas with friends and politicians and can get multipel points on view on controversial issues. Any change in net neutrality that limits my access is a huge negative for me, for millions of others and for the country as a whole. We must maintain net neutraity to protect us against corporate predators who want to control the information we receive and how fast we can get it. That is absolutely wrong. Corporations advocating for a two lane internet are already making enormous profits. Let them live on those. They do not need to venture into the greedy-avarice category and destroy our democracy in the process.

—Glenn E. Lambert, Springfield, OH

Without a free and open internet we can't be a free capitalist society.

—Michele Prestenback, Slidell, LA

it should be for all, not just the elite.

—Shannon Dickinson, ,

The internet is not meant to be owned. It should be free to access and be free of censorship.

—, Brooklyn, NY

Net Neutrality is important because citizens don't have the power to have the speed because we don't have the money the large corporations have.

—Phyllis Reynolds, Salem, OR

I'm on a fixed budget. I can't afford to pay more than I'm paying now. Please consider we, the little people, instead of only the giant corporations. Thank you.

—Mary Ann Black, Caseyville, IL

I believe everyone should have the same access

—David Pethick, ,

Net neutrality is the cornerstone of a robust and commercially viable internet which will drive innovation and economic growth in a truly democratic fashion. Adopting archaic policies designed to protect telecom company profits in an area they have failed to innovate in is anathema to both the fcc's mandate and free market economics.

—Christopher McLean, ,

We depend on fast internet and want no less than our colleagues in Europe

—Peter Sigmann MD, STURGEON BAY, WI

Freedom of speech and expression is a basic human right. The wheels of the world economy also depend heavily on fast and open internet!

It's a right

—John Fisher, ,

This is important to me (and the majority of internet users) because it's the right thing to do for the majority of Americans. If your charter means anything, then the economic, social, and physical well-being of the ordinary telecommunications user must be recognized and given the top priority. Investor-owned utilities cannot be first in the FCC's deliberations, they deserve consideration too, but not at the expense of the majority of Americans.

—Mr. John Palmer, Stockton, CA

The Internet has become a crucial information medium for Humanity, it should not be controlled by the whims of a few

—Alexander Wright, ,

Keep the Internet democratic!

—Darrell Tomkins, ,

Without net neutrality, there is no net. Enough is enough.

—PM vZ, ,

Freedom on the internet is very important to me.

—Sam Martinjako, Burton, OH

It's enough to pay to get on the net after that access should be to everything, it's the library of the world I should be all in after I get my library card

—Lee delany, ,

The internet should not be held to ransom for the profits of big businesses, and to the detriment of everyone else. That is exactly what the end of net neutrality means.

—Jason Murray, ,

Maintaining net neutrality is crucial to keeping a level playing field so all people have the opportunity to contributing to our world.

—Dudley Leggett, ,

I can't understand the ludicrous thought on slowing down the internet when people want faster internet. The fees for internet are already way too high.

—Sharon Schnurr, ,

Because Lincoln said "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people"... turning the internet over to corporations, top-one-percenters, and other ALEC middle-men trashes those Lincoln/American rights and principles.

—Steve Voelkel, Altamont, TN

I don't want entrepreneurs and start-ups to be shut out because of too-high "fast lane" costs. America is supposed to be a land of equality, and I believe all of us should have equal access for equal service for equal cost. Additionally, I see no reason why internet providers can't be considered common carriers. They build "pipes" that carry a service to us, just like old Ma Bell built telephone lines and the electric companies built poles and wires. Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers. It makes sense. And it's fair. Thank you for pursuing the right course of behalf of ALL Americans.

—Donna Z Carswell, Huntingdon Valley, PA

Because I wholeheartedly support the freedom of individuality and equal possibilities for everyone.

—Alexander Biryukov, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me, because I do not want the internet turned into something that I do not want to use!

—John Schleicher, Hastings, NE

It should be as common and easy to access as the telephone is today, it is no longer a luxury but a necessity to living in today's world

—Chris Grande, ,

The world is watching. And often you people set the example. So be responsible. Scrap the Fast Lane. NOW!

—Aditya Pratim Maiti, ,

Freedom and civil liberties!

—Dr Eli Hegeman, ny, NY

The FCC should not have as much business as they do in our business. Quit taxing and fining me to use the internet now.

—Guy Fawkes, Goldonna, LA

It's quiet simply the fairest approach!

—Adrian Trowell, ,

One thing I love about the internet is that it exposes me to diverse people and ideas I may not have encountered in my day to day life. Maybe every idea is not equally valid, but it is better to examine it and at least have the chance to hear it. More importantly, everyone deserves the chance to be heard. Isn't this one of the fundamental assumptions of a democratic society?

—Kelli Hines, Carson, CA

Eliminating net neutrality would stifle innovation and preclude small companies from being able to put their products and ideas and applications forward in favor of already established individuals and corporations which have more access to capital. The essence of the Internet is free access; eliminate that access, and you kill the Internet.

—, Novato, CA

Free (almost) and open and equal access to the information via the Internet is important to me and to the students I volunteer with. Diane Yokel Smith

—Diane Yokel Smith, Littleton, CO

A slow lane is just another way to jack up the already high charges of these (shamefully) legal monopolies

—Robert Volkmann, Salem, OR

I agree with the Free Press plan, and would not like to see price discrimination on the Internet.

—Craig McElheny, Costa Mesa, CA

Please do not allow this oligopoly to hijack the information highway and gouge users who will not be able to afford this much needed service. If you allow this to happen, we will be taking a step backward.

—Tony Estrela, ,

There should never be a fee on this. This is my life line, I'm 72 and use the computer to communicate with the outside world.

—Judy, Oshkosh, WI

I rely on the internet for technology and reading documents because I am blind. I need the speed to access reading materials. I am on a fixed income.

—Karen Clark, Raleigh, NC

NOBODY has the right to kill anothers' right to free press, no matter if you do have the biggest guns!

—Steve Wood, ,

This is one more shameful bid to make citizens of this great nation less important than corporations. I have lived here, worked here and paid taxes here for 74 years. I should not be defined as less important than a corporation.

—Diane Libman, chicago, IL

The internet is a valuable common resource to people worldwide. It does not belong under the control of people who are mainly concerned with their own financial interests.

—Tamar Elizabeth Barnousky, Morristown, TN

Fiarness/

—Elizabeth Burrows, ,

I count on the internet to give me access to information and opinions that don't appear in other media where the wealthy often control the discourse. The internet is a vital part of the freedom of speech and the press which makes our democracy work. Don't destroy our democracy by putting the internet up for sale to the 1% and excluding the rest of us from full access. I need net neutrality to participate fully as a citizen of our great country.

—Shyama Orum, New York, NY

I don't think Comcast, AT&T and Verizon should rule the Internet.

—Kurt Kiebler, Overland Park, KS

The Internet should be an open and fair environment for everyone.

—Scott Wylie, ,

Freedom is essential for human kind

I need access to the small volunteer website that helps me face a potentially life-threatening disease.

—Lynn Thomas, Burbank, CA

I do not want big corporations to be able to provide fast lanes and slow lanes for internet users. I want it to be a level playing field where everyone gets the fast lanes.

—Evelyn Mcchesney, Seattle, WA

Equal access

—Wayne McMichael, Baton Rouge, LA

It's not yours or any others place to limit free speech and free enterprise in the name of bigger profits for big business. If you pay attention to polls and data collection then you will know that the USA ranks somewhere in the 40th percentile in terms of freedom of the press and speech. This initiative solely motivated by profits for multi-million corporations would further limit those freedoms our constitution ensures for all. Yes, I understand that business has the right to charge whatever they want. However, as I understand it, these companies use resources supplied by the people of this country through our taxes (those few of us who actually pay them). Please have some integrity (unlike most federal bureaucracies that control the lives of the people in this country) and do what is right for the people in this financially challenged USA. Please stop making policy changes (laws) that make big business richer and keeps the poor and middle class down.

—Michael Laxton, Woodbury, NJ

Leave well enough alone. It continue to be of the people, by the people, and for the people.

—Judith Glixon, Lexington, MA

The internet continues to have important information.

The internet belongs to everyone.

—Brent Ingberg, ,

Free exchange of ideas and information is critical for a free society.

—Lynne F.Barnes, Santa Rosa, CA

Net Neutrality is important to me, to all of us, because many of us simply don't have big enough bucks to support slowed-down websites and guarantee premium access to the information we need.

—James Miller, Schaumburg, IL

The Internet is a public utility and should not be artificially slowed down for those who are lower income.

—Christine Anderson, Eugene, OR

The internet is critical for democracy and it should not be regulated or controlled by a few giant corporations. There should not be an internet for the haves and another one for the have nots.

—Rod Hodgson, ,

It's the access to information, stupid.

—David T, Kensington, CA

The Internet is the modern equivalent of the public square in which people can "gather" and exchange, debate, and discuss ideas, opinions, data, you-name-it. To turn the Internet into tiered "lanes" of access in which people are restricted in their ability to participate in the democratic process based upon who their service providers are, as well as whether their service providers want to give limited or full-throttle access to sites those folks may wish to access, is deplorable. It is contrary to the vision our Founders had, and is simply another brick in the road toward transforming this country into a corporatocracy rather than a democracy.

—Ms. Stacey A. Ward Esq., Los Lunas, NM

Freedom of uncensored information for everyone not just the privileged.

—Nicola DeAngelis, Blairstown, NJ

I need to feel SAFE while using the internet, and not threatened by outside interests.

—Judith Rainsford, ,

It is a must

—Jeremy, New York, NY

Don't change the Internet; it works fine just fine the way it is.

—Steve Schwenke, O Fallon, MO

Net neutrality is the foundation for innovation on the internet and is crucial to the advancement of human society. A stratified internet serves only to profit ISPs and must not be allowed.

—Gary Van Domselaar, ,

It is most certainly foolish to repeat our past and pass judgement on the less fortunate such as myself. This is the equivalent behavior of discrimination where none belongs but all for the sake of money. Putting this into effect is like turning back 100 years and going back to slavery and taking the equal rights for people of different races, women, children and even animals away and negating the fair treatment and the equal rights for all - something that has been worked very hard to attain and should remain. Big telecom already has packages available for different affordability. This "slow lane" is just a greedy money grab. Shame on you.

—Linda, ,

Do not allow the rich minority to exploit us any more than they do now. Keep the net the same for everyone.

—Shawn Armaly, ,

I fully support the Free Press Plan for Net Neutrality. Paying high fees for premium access to the internet would disadvantage so many people. Primarily, students from low-income families and people on fixed incomes. Once again, these people will be disadvantaged for big business profits.

—Cherie Studwell, ,

The net is for all to yous not the power full.

—Stephen, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me because it prevents biasing the internet

—Eric Vara, ,

The internet shouldn't be slow for anyone!

—Brad Jones, Salt Lake City, UT

It is unfair to small businesses & unwealthy individuals for big Telecom to change the internet. FREEDOM is at stake. DIVERSITY is at stake. CREATIVITY is at stake. These principals make our evolving humanity civilized! I work on the internet everyday at my graphic design job. Please keep the playing field level for all users. FAIR IS FAIR! My children deserve an equal internet. If only the rich are able to afford premium service young generations, including the growing special needs population, of which my two Autistic sons belong, will have yet another disadvantage. Please keep the internet open. Thank you for your time. Sincerely, Trisha Lalancette 201 W. County Line Rd.

I pay enough to have internet access. Please let me have equal access to those who could afford to pay more.

—Lynne Brimecombe, Ann Arbor, MI

The destruction of TRUE Net Neutrality and a free, open Internet - favored by BigTelecomm, BigCable and their lickspittle cronies, Tom Wheeler among them - is NOT about democracy... it is about Fascism.

—Meredith Sheane, Missoula, MT

We the people should get wide open access to the Internet. Not multi-speed at prices set by serving company's for their own profit.

—Philip Eckel, Saint James, NY

Net neutrality is self explanatory, like freedom. As simple as that.

—Bogdan Radu, ,

Net Neutrality - the real thing, not just words - enables me to participate in the Democracy our nation is intended to be. What could be more important to our country? Not profits. Not corporate power. Please take your mission to serve "We, The People" sincerely, and reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II.

—Kathy Wooten, Las Cruces, NM

This kind of power should not be in the hands of a few, making it only accessible to those who can pay big bucks for it. Keep the internet in the hands of the public, hooray for net neutrality!

—Ali EL-Mokadem, ,

Abandoning Common carriage for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power.

—Loren Hughes, ,

The Internet must remain open and free at all times. What Mr Wheeler is proposing is nothing short of roting the system and censorship.

—Peter Duynstee, ,

As a disabled person that can't really travel, I can see the world from the comfort of my home. Please don't change this.

—Angie Pirck, Davenport, IA

The internet has given millions of people worldwide access to information than they could ever afford to buy. It is utterly despicable that FCC wishes to steal back their universal right to free information. The disgraceful GREED and AVARICE being displayed by FCC is unconscionable.

—Katrina Hergstrom, ,

Destroying net neutrality by passing the slow lane regulations would be akin to segregation. Creating two essentially different Internets would essentially destroy its very nature of openness and collaboration. The internet is not cable it is not controlled by corporations, people create the internet and when you restrict access to it you create a segregated internet.

—Omar Garcia Garrido, Miami, FL

Like I have money to spend it people, please some mercy

—Daaa, ,

The internet as is, is a level playing field, with the way that ISP and media companies are combined we run a risk of services that compete with the established monopolies never being able to get off the ground just making the situation here in Canada much much worse. Don't allow for the creation of a second class internet.

—Roger, ,

Net Neutrality is essential to keeping the internet just and in favour of everyone who uses it. Putting a fast lane that would only benefit large business' rather than the normal man is a clear sign of a major problem. Currently we live in an era when corporate interests are always met before the interests and benefits of the people, who make up the funding for these business'... without us there is no money going into the company. So to undermine the will of the people would be a grotesque mistake. It's pretty simple really, do good for the people and the people will do good back. Treat the customers right, and you won't have any problems, but these new proposals are absolutely against the will and benefit of the customer.

—Jordan Bidwell, ,

When major conglomerates such as the telecommunications companies gain too much control over an entity such as the internet, it is with only one purpose in mind, to gouge even more money from the public and keep them powerless, or to give more power to business partners. Should they get their way, I can foresee many mom and pop internet businesses either go bankrupt, or fail otherwise. I can foresee businesses such as Netflix fail, simply because the big telecom giants want all the movie rental to themselves, with no competition to control rental rates. It's just another move to get even richer and greedier. If our governments and their agencies cannot protect us, then no one can or will. We put governments in power, to serve and protect the people, not to be bought out by business conglomerates. Sid

Big Telecom should not be allowed to do what want. The people made Internet what it is today, people must be on control of what they want to access, not profit-hungry companies.
—Felipe Mariano Alencar e Silva, ,

"Free speech is a right. The internet is freely available to anybody who wants to use. It's important for people to realize that the ability of our community to come together, and give this kind of gift to the world depends on a certain legal infrastructure that makes it possible for people to share knowledge freely – in the USA, the First Amendment is incredibly important in terms of the ever- evolving internet. Private Citizens deserve to be uncensored or molested by corporations, who's only goal is to gain more control of the people and line their pockets.
—Trevor McKay, ,

Net neutrality is really important because I honestly don't believe corporations have our interests at heart. They are commercial entities and so care about money more than truth or freedom of expression, and probably aren't particularly interested in small startups that will significantly lose out in an internet fast lane where they are not able to pay to get faster response times on their sites. Please don't stifle freedom of information, small not-for-profits and small commercial enterprises in this way!
—David Gardner, Bentleigh East,

Regular people (not faceless, soulless, greedy corporations) deserve equality, fairness and net neutrality
—Howard Youngs, Tucson, AZ

Customers and/or businesses having to pay for parity of access to each other is a tax payable not to a democratically-elected government, but to corporations which do not represent anyone - except, usually, other corporations. The Founding Fathers had the right idea about taxation without representation, and a similar level of outrage and resistance can be expected in the not-too-distant future if you permit individuals' communications with each other to be subject to the whims of a third party who is already being paid to carry them! That kind of double-dipping - pay me again for the service you've already paid me for, or I'll do it badly - is blatant anticompetitive exploitation of a superior market position, especially where an oligopoly exists - as is the case for this critical infrastructure.
—Philip Minchin, ,

Net Neutrality is important to us as Internet users!

—Carole Huelsberg, port townsend, WA

As it stands the internet is the only current free podium for speech that is free for everyone. stifling that ability in any way should be considered a crime especially in light of several of these large companies are in fact monopolies in some locales (see Comcast) with their own political agendas. not to mention the horrifying possibilities with the recent ruling on hobbylobby and the rather scary possibilities that it brings to the table (the possibility of censoring or discriminating and claiming immunity based on religious belief) please let saner minds prevail and protect our future and freedoms. not just in the U.S. but help to do so on a global level. thank you for your time

Information for all, equally.

—Dan Ireland, Saint Paul, MN

There are a lot of reasons, but the one that sticks out the most is the underdogs. Small businesses are helped greatly by being able to easily get a website so people can find them. The internet makes things so easy, and by getting rid of Net Neutrality, it takes a huge step backwards. It doesn't just affect America, it affects us all.

—Michelle Borschawa, ,

Net Neutrality is important not only to Internet users and investors as well as the global public, but important to the First Amendment rights of all American users and the rights of other Internet users around the globe. Allowing Big Telecom companies to control the Internet would destroy these rights and freedoms, and destroy the Internet completely.

The internet was designed and built by volunteers the world over, and is now an essential service, just as telephones and postal services are. It is usually necessary for doing and reporting to my employers, finding work, education, research, library services, news and finding emergency information and other services. No private entity has any moral right to control it, change it for private benefit, or to restrict access or charge for access to it. Just as when cable companies destroyed our access to common publicly available TV signals, and then charge everyone to view programming that advertisers or the public have already paid for, they should never be given this kind of access or control over public communications. Just as the post office has no right to interfere with our mail without a court order, neither should private enterprises interfere with our internet communications. As it is now; for only telephone and internet, I am charged about $80.00 without additional long distance charges or TV. This amount is absolutely ridiculous, criminal. It is FOOD money. Most infrastructure was paid for decades ago, and a lot of new infrastructure is paid for by real-estate developers which is then passed on to home buyers. It would be giving the anti-social Trolls and Goblins the ability to name their price and create tolls on a public, volunteer-built bridge or roadway. It is giving public property to powerful greedy entities. No one has that right.

—L Redmond, ,

The internet (as it is right now) is a stronghold of the First Amendment and it NEEDS to stay that way. If something isn't broken, don't fix it!

—Caitlin Savino, Ithaca, NY

It is a good research tool; it is a relatively inexpensive way (as opposed to long distance calls) to keep in touch; it keeps us updated on what is happening in the world the instant it happens

Net Neutrality is important to me because the Internet is used by people freely and openly, without any interference, unfair charges or regulation by corporations. We need to keep it that way. It is important to all Americans and all people. The EU has passed Net Neutrality. Why should the US representatives and officials be bought out by the for-profits? Why shouldn't they also support and represent the interests of the people?

—Charles Pierce, Seattle, WA

Net Neutrality is important to democracy, fair internet market prices, and the entire flow and structure of the internet. Why are we still holding back on supporting Net Neutrality? Stop listening to those greedy wealthy media lobbyists with their corrupt agenda and business model and fix it now please!

The Internet is the only means of freedom of expression for millions around the world and as such it provides hope for a better and more just future for humanity.

—Diane Norris, ,

Net Neutrality, is important to me because the internet is one of those few important tools that hasn't fully been exploited by corporate interests. I'd like for it to stay the way it is, as I see no need for a corporation to manipulate the amount of information I receive, and I know corporations, don't really care about us. So I see no need to care for them, and their interests.

—Salman, ,

To: The Head of the FCC The doctrine of net neutrality has spawned an era of creativity and global networking the likes of which the world has never before experienced. With the freedom to communicate and collaborate in even more innovative and sophisticated ways, and as technology morphs into even more possibilities that can benefit mankind and our planet, it seems absurd that the FCC would consider allowing large monopolistic corporations permission to abort the common good in favor of profiteering and protecting these corporations from the inevitable competition that would require them to innovate or fail. That would be a complete failure of the FCC to fulfill its fundamental purpose. It would be an attack on what makes America, the land of opportunity, great; what it stands for; and it would betray the promise of American ingenuity to the rest of the world. - Jim Bergquist

I don't pay for tiers in my representation in congress; so why should I have to pay extra for media content I already pay a high price for to my computer? I pay my internet provider for access to the internet, and I also pay Netflix for media streaming service. How much sense does it make that they get to tack on an extra charge to me to make sure it works, and also charge Netflix to make sure it works? Comcast proved the infrastructure myth to be incorrect, or how else did streaming quality on Netflix get better the next day once Netflix agreed to pay them money to support their bandwidth needs?

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it It is arbitrary and essentially censorship. The internet works beautifully and has been for years for reason relating to neutral A pay-to-play Internet worries me because It is exploiting the air the we breath in for profit. It will only benefit monopolies The internet has been a boon for mankind since its beginning undeniably for reason directly related to so-called neutrality. It stands to reason eventually large corporation would want to exploit it directly and tap into it for sheer greed and profit. The FCC should be protecting us from such prioritization and preferential treatment. It is entirely selfish and beyond reproach that the FCC chair is as corrupted as he deems fit. The only benefit would be for the very few(rich). It would be only the beginning to what I see you trying to do. Regardless it is morally wrong and it is corrupting freedom whether or not the FCC Chair chooses to see that. You are suggesting to exploit the air we speak in. As a Daughter of the American Revolution through my mother's mother; as the granddaughter of a man who commanded an escort carrier fleet in the South Pacific and also commanded in the Mediterranean theatre during WWII, retiring from the US Navy as a Vice Admiral; as the daughter of a woman who has served on the national board of the American Civil Liberties Union and still serves on the Nebraska board, herself the Vice Admiral's daughter; as the daughter and niece of US Navy fighter pilots during WWII and the Korean war; and as the sister of a brother who served our country's Army during the Vietnam war, I feel the privilege of having a free, uncensored voice to participate openly in our democratic process. One of the things my family loves the most about the Internet is that it's a level playing field for free expression, economic opportunity, and new innovative services, and that it extends to people we have come to know all over the world. As I understand the current issue, the Federal Communications Commission may destroy Net Neutrality, and give four big corporations -- Comcast, AT&T, Time Warner, and Verizon -- unprecedented control over what we see and do on the Internet. This flies in the face of so much of what I have been raised to believe is true about this country. Such an action would expand the power of these already too large media conglomerates, which in turn will decrease the individual powers of the voices of we the people. It may force ISPs to censor internet content, to the extent of removing entire websites, and it could disallow entire families from using the internet for alleged infringements. But hasn't the FCC also opened the door to a plan that could protect the Internet and its glorious diversity and creativity for decades: reclassifying it as a public utility like water -- equally accessible to all? Though there is a lot on the internet, a lot in the various media, a lot that is said by people whose opinions differ from my own all over this country, I continue to respect the rights of every person to hold and speak those opinions. To censor them, to consider the rights of those media conglomerates who have more money and wield more power as more important than those who have little, is wrong under our constitution and is not what I was raised to believe is the way of things in the free United States. Please, do not even consider a move that may very likely censor our freedom of speech just because new technology has allowed our voices to be heard more broadly ~ like this very thing I am doing in writing to you. These airwaves must remain open to all, like any other public utility that is a part of our every day life. Please know that we, the people of the United States, are here to form a more perfect union, conceived in liberty, not a more corrupt and narrow one conceived and owned by only a few. We are dedicated to the fact that all are created equal, none to be considered of less worth or dignity than others, no voices to be silenced. Please understand that we are many, and that a democracy is measured by the freedom it gives its dissidents, like our country's Founders, not by the freedoms it takes away from its already assimilated conformists. We the People are here to stay, to stand up, to speak out, and to help keep our country free and true to the vision of its revolutionary Founders. DAR, US Navy, ACLU, US Army, peacemakers, activists, artists, thinkers, fighters, writers, educators, volunteers ~ my family. Help us stay free.

We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress.
—Taryn Kelly, ,

People should not have to pay to use the internet. It should be a global service (look at Facebook's vision of bringing free internet to developing area that cannot access it). This was the original intention of the internet, a freely interconnected global community. Charging tolls to use the internet at a nominal speed is a HUGE step in the wrong direction. This will destroy many of the finest aspects, intentions and possibilities the internet provides and holds for us. Today, Email through the Internet is the main way Americans contact their elected political representatives. If ISP's are allowed to divide the Internet's data-transfer lines into effective "Fast" & "Slow" lanes (access to which will be determined by a user's ability to pay), anyone who is limited to the "Slow" lane on the Internet will be effectively limited in their ability to contact their elected representatives. Sure, there are other ways one can contact one's US Senator (for example). But in the last two years I have been asked to sign literally hundreds of on-line petitions intended to be seen by my various elected officials. And, in the same time, the number of paper petitions I have been asked to sign I could count on one hand. It seems clear to me that, in the Twenty-First Century, to intentionally limit an American citizen's access to the Internet is to interfere with their ability to communicate with their elected representatives. Please protect Net Neutrality. Ban the "Fast Lane"!!

Net Neutrality levels the playing field by providing equal access to ALL users, not just the wealthy few. As such, it mirrors the First Amendment to the Constitution, providing free expression for ALL Americans - not just for those who can afford it. Destroying Net Neutrality will not only stifle American creativity and innovation, it will cripple and devastate millions of small American businesses which rely on a neutral and open Internet to market and advertise their products and services. A Neutral Internet is the cornerstone of Free Enterprise in this country, and should be preserved and made available to ALL - NOT just to the wealthy few. Destroying Net Neutrality represents the worst form of government censorship and flies in the face of any country which calls itself a democracy. Rather than destroy Net Neutrality, the FCC should RECLASSIFY the Internet as a PUBLIC UTILITY. As such, the Internet would, just like water and power utilities, remain equally open and available to ALL Americans - as it should be in our democracy!

—Eric Kehew, Winterville, NC

Already VC are refusing to fund start-ups that depend on a reliably fast internet connection all because they can't afford to pay big Telecom's extortion fees. Only Net Neutrality can grant individuals a fair chance to share their ideas with the whole world. Only Net Neutrality can ensure FAIR competition amongst content providers. However, your new rules would simply help big media shut down their competition. How is it fair for the startup companies who do business online, and millions of individual bloggers and Youtubers out there, when their content would all get choked by the 'slow lane', all because they couldn't cough up millions of dollars for a faster one? I can freely browse the Internet without any artificial, site-specific price tags or speed bumps imposed on me -- all thanks to Net Neutrality. Websites earn my traffic by providing me with the best services and content -- under one free and open system, and that's the way it should be. This is why Net Neutrality matters to me.

This affects the whole world, including us Canadians. The US is setting the precedent and our own oligopoly is currently making a similar move. This is a clear and simple decision. The world needs Net Neutrality. I can't believe it's even a conversation, there is simply no benefit to the public to do otherwise. In this immediate circumstance, broadband providers must be reclassified as common carriers. Not doing so would make it apparent that the FCC is in the pocket of the broadband providers and therefore a complete disgrace. Worse than ineffective. Worse than pointless. Actually harmful to the people they are meant to protect. The world is watching. Thank you for your time.

The way the internet developed into what it is today is the product of the unconcious hunger for knowledge and natural urge for sharing that knowledge freely with the world that every human has. This principle has to be the foremost priority, as it benefits humanity and its environment in a immensely higher degree than any other prerogative that could be taken into account when redacting guidelines and laws concerning the neutrality, usability, affordability and availability of internet access for the widest portion of society at all possible.

Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. This is what America is about until SCOTUS changed that corporations are PEOPLE! And destroyed parts of the civil rights act for voting protections and destroying affirmative action, America is becoming all about the rich and powerful and everyday citizens have less and less power in what the government does! The Net Neutrality changes that the FCC want to change will effect everyone from toddlers to elderly that use computers! We have thousands of people who use computers in our county libraries! These are people who do not have the money for computers or Internet access in their home! Net Neutrality is essential for ALL Americans! This MUST BE CONSIDERED!

Internet should stay as is, no changes.
—A Pogel, Fort Lauderdale, FL

We already have enough cronies destroying our economy, markets, and system of government. The Internet should be free, keeping everybody on the same playing field.
—Karen Weidensee, Watertown, WI

I am a Veteran and can't get out much, so I depend on the internet to keep me in touch with the world. It is wrong to make the internet a two class system where the 'have nots' have to wait in back of the line for the wealthy to get theirs first. Keep the internet neutral! Thank you.
—Phillip K Zimelman, Brooklyn, NY

Because it helps to keep freedoms and to keep things in check.
—, Newton, NC

The Internet is a public utility. A public utility must be neutral to its users. Political appointees trash everything they get their hands on, and the FCC Chairman's initial proposals regarding the Internet is no exception. The FCC is supposed to serve the American people, not the large corporations. Any chairman or political appointee who abuses his position to effectively "sell" an American asset to the large corporations deserves Donald Trump's famous two words; "You're fired". The American people are watching. I am watching. I vote. It's unfortunate one party gets voted out when the American economy crashed, and another "bum" gets voted in, and the American people are stuck with the "fallout" from the political appointees. Where does this crap end? Mr. Wheeler, do the right thing, advise the FCC to treat the Internet as a public utility, and then recuse yourself from any more proceedings involving media or the internet. The late Newton Minow declared in 1962 that television is a wasteland. Probably a true statement then and more likely now. Media ownership consolidation championed by President Reagan and his successors trashed broadcast radio and television, creating a bigger wasteland. With few exceptions, the best radio listening is on certain AM channels for news and below 92.1 MHz on the FM side for quality, all around programming. The internet offers unlimited opportunities for start up enterprises at low cost. The Commission's proposals to "whore out" the internet to large corporations and subdivide the bandwidth is not only improper and unreasonable. Everyone in the USA deserves EQUAL access to the internet without having to pay a premium for access OR bandwidth. Please pay attention to this; I will vote accordingly this fall and in 2016. I will advise family and friends to do likewise, both in person, email, and any other appropriate means. I don't care what the high paid lobbyists tell you...your best advice from me is to throw the lobbyists out the door immediately. Your (and the FCC's) responsibility is to the American public!
—R M. Burrow Jr., Everett, PA

Please, please save the Internet bandwidth for us everyday people, not just the wealthy and powerful!!

Freedom of Expression is guaranteed by the US Constitution. This is a right for all people and should not be compromised.
—Ann L. Gunderson, Bellingham, WA

The internet is a public utility now, regardless of how and what it started off as. Besides, we, the tax payers were the ones who paid for the actual development of the internet anyway.

—Thomas M. Cannon, Haslett, MI

Internet Service Providers (ISPs) provide a pipe to my house, like natural gas company or electricity lines. They don't decide what I do with the gas or the electricity or charge one rate for heating the house and another for using my BBQ. In the same manner. ISPs should not be allowed to charge for specific purpose or to slow down / speed up certain uses I make of internet.

—Girish Shah, ,

It's only fair. Giving priority to those that are able to more readily afford fast lanes is not what your country is supposed to represent. You represent fairness, but giving priority to the rich corporations, who are considered "people", represents a large imbalance. Having fast lanes gives priority to the extraordinarily few corporations over the more than 300 million Americans.

—Robinder Singh, ,

the internet belongs to everyone, just as does air. Are we soon likely to see control of clean air held by corporations?

—Sue Bettison, ,

The government, and therefore, by extension, the people, initiated the public internet as an educational tool. The World Wide Web was then developed on top of this backbone as an extension of and to make use of the internet easier for average people. The infrastructure has been financed in great deal directly by government and through government incentives to telecoms. It is therefore not in the best interests of those who have paid for this infrastructure to have these telecoms now dictate what can be easily accessed over that infrastructure based on a profit based system controlled by them. This would be little more than extortion by the US telecoms. The "Web" is the one place that is a reasonably level playing field for commercial interests, large and small and for average people to easily find information or products without interference from large corporations.

TITLE 2 COMMON CARRIER

—JL L. Good, Topeka, KS

Internet for everyone is a small yet significant happiness that we all hold dear Who are you to deny the mass's this happiness just to make some money and/or because some sites offend you, many others like the things you detest, don't like it, don't look at it It's that simple

—Joel hodes, ,

This attempted restriction on our freedoms is deplorable. No form of communication between actual human beings should be allowed to be so strangled by large emotionless corporations.

—Aimee Cervenka, Spokane, WA

We all need access to information to act as informed citizens of our society. If we don't all have access to the internet to gain information, we won't all be informed, and thus will be ignorant participants in our country.

—Sherry Sharpnack, Lincoln, NE

An open internet is essential to our democracy.

—Carol Lynn Harp, Black Diamond, WA

Equal access to the Internet is necessary to each citizen and imperative if we are to maintain a free and democratic country!

—Helene Willson, Stewart, OH

An unrestricted Internet is necessary for new ideas and new businesses to spread and grow. Allowing premium access would begin to limit it to only the large companies who can pay the most.

—David Simmons, ,

It's important to me because I'm an American who has been proud of our national ideals that mean fair play for everyone. Everyone, not just the rich.

—MaryEllen K Anderson, Seattle, WA

A person should have free access to the Internet without restrictions!

—Kevin D. Smith, Toronto,

If the internet is interfered with too much and costs too much I will start using it less and less. I lived without it before and can do so again.

—Marj Reimer, ,

Neutrality will help me stay in business please don't help pass these new fees and rules you will kill every small, home grown crafters businesses and countless others to stay connected to the net we know and love. This important so that everyone has the right to express themselves and be informed at every level think of your own children and their children we all have a right to have the internet. Thanks

It is a resource for everyone to communicate through.

—Nate Wolf, Fort Collins, CO

We need net neutrality so we can continue to receive our information not a slow down version or allow big corporations to decide what they think we need. This is censorship and allowing the 1% to have more access than others.

—Ann Kelly, Mount Laurel, NJ

The concept of Net Neutrality and the concept of Freedom work together. Therefore any idea which reduces Net Neutrality also reduces our level of freedom. Any act of such a reduction is therefore wrong.

—Gordon Edwards, ,

Taxpayers paid for its development. The military did the IT. It belongs to the American people, not Big Telecom.

—Meryle A. Korn, Portland, OR

The internet is an amazing resource that has brought about an incredible information and communication revolution. It was intended to be free and equal for all users, and it should remain that way. Net neutrality is a must!

I don't want corporations controlling the internet. Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers like other nations do.

—Patrick Collins, Denver, CO

The internet is truly a place of equality. Don't take that away or change it somehow.

—Karen Raabe, Scottsville, KY

bluntly speaking I am getting sick and tired of big companies coming in and trying to run over the small and middle income people of the world because they think they can dictate rules and regulation, draft some regulations that will eventually screw over and choke out anyone who can't pay their rates because they think they own it. Don't let them own it! Keep the net neutral. Do the right thing and prevent some sleazy backroom collusion they formulated years ago for nothing more than more money for people who care nothing about free speech, innovation, and unlimited access to knowledge for the rest of the world.

—Don Shandley, ,

Freedom to talk, share and search my interests on the internet is important. It should not belong to anyone.

—Jessica Hughes, Novato, CA

I make my living on the internet - and have seen firsthand the power of the internet to enable the creation of new companies, new ideas and new paradigms that can (and have) literally change the world. The innovation behind this is based on a public good - the fibers that we have all paid for these many years. This freedom must be protected so that the next big ideas can take root and grow into job creating, tax generating businesses. Thank you!

—Matt Preval, ,

The Internet isn't just about big business. It's how people find jobs, communicate with each other, stay in touch with family far away, and keep small businesses afloat. I'm disabled and the Internet is the only way I'm able to get out of the chair I'm confined to and see the world. The Internet shouldn't be handed over to some small minority so they can make more money. It should be the even playing field we all can enjoy and use in whatever way suits us best.

—Tracy Pease, Rockford, IL

Because it creates a level playing field for all regardless of age sex race or socioeconomic background. It is important to preserve this.

—Matthew, ,

I rather not have my choice of online content be determined by whomever can provide the most money.

—Eric Mew, ,

Everyone should receive the same quality of service regardless of what they can afford to pay for internet usage.

—David McFadden, ,

This is Canada. I shouldn't even have to be signing a petition to preserve Net Neutrality. The FCC should use its Title II authority to protect it.

—Joanna Bandziorowski, ,

Net neutrality is important because it provides a more level playing field for small businesses, which can compete equally with the bigger companies/corporations and even supplant them. Destroying net neutrality paves the way for large corporations to control the flow of information, which is never a good thing. What good is freedom of speech when the media by which that freedom is exercised is controlled by outside interests?

—Shane Parker, ,

As a freelance web designer, my business depends on net neutrality to compete myself against larger agencies and help my clients compete with their larger competition.

—Steve Tieulie, ,

I rely on the internet everyday for work, entertainment, and general living. This means that I use a variety of websites that are hosted and run by a variety of people, meaning big companies to maybe just one individual. No matter which website I am on I expect the data on said websites to be delivered to me through my ISP at the same speed. All data on any website I visit is important to me, otherwise I would not be visiting that website. Please consider this while making decisions on net neutrality. Thank you.

—Alex Kreitzer, Cincinnati, OH

As an adult, I should be the one who decides what I want access to on the Internet. I will then decide what to do with the information I've obtained.

—Kim Wallace, ,

Net is for everyone, equally

—Christian Major, ,

Internet was the one place (outside of a public library) that you could feel you were on the same playing field as everyone else in this country. There are so many "sides" being taken. Realize that freedom is found in few places and Internet is one of them.

—Eric Walker, Riverside, CA

as a permanently disabled person on fixed income, without Net Neutrality, I lose my only affordable and unfettered means of communication with my friends and family as well as my only source of information. To add insult to injury, I would be submitted to a barrage of ads from the corporations chosen by my internet provider and I would have to pay an ever increasing and arbitrarily set price for the "privilege" of being inundated with crap while being kept incommunicado from family and friends and barred from access unbiased news.

—Muriel Coudurier-Curveur, Santa Barbara, CA

Net Neutrality is important to me, and other people like me because it allows for various freedom's such as art, creativity, and speech. To censor the Internet is to enslave "We the People". And allow these conglomerate monopolistic corporations to have all the power. In 1776 we fought the british, nearly 200 years later or so we are now fighting monopolistic corporations. No company should have the right to censor, or choose which IP traffic gets preferential treatment. The Internet should be free of censorship, and of privileged traffic.

—Edgar Robert, Hialeah, FL

It allows the rich and the poor to communicate in an equal manner.

—Georgia and John Locker, Fort Collins, CO

As a common ground where people can meet and democracy can take root, a free and uncensored internet is vital.

—Simon Stroud, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me because so much of my life is already subject to corporate control and influence. Please let us have the internet as a public utility and let it be democratic, let it support liberty and communication!

—Carolyn Hudson, Wenatchee, WA

Freedom!

—Natashia Thewes, Winterset, IA

I strongly urge the FCC to reclassify Internet service providers as common carriers. The needs of the majority of everyday internet users must take precedence over the telecom companies' desire for greater profit. The internet in this day and age is an essential service that must be equally and easily accessible to all. To this end, reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers would ensure that they can't interfere with websites whose content they disapprove of (which would become an assault on freedom of speech), and would keep equal access available to all.

—Dane Ailill, Shapleigh, ME

Please identify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II. Otherwise we lose net neutrality. Don't destroy the "Peoples Magic Carpet".

—Paul Steffen, Milford, IN

I want to know why when we have a system that works just fine, why do we need to change it so that it costs people more money for the same service.

—Patrick Studt, Madison, WI

It is important to me because I communicate to loved ones via FaceTime, Skype, and Facebook. I am also on a fixed income. To lose that ability would be devastating!! Keep the internet neutral & free!!!!

—Jaime La Pierre, Philadelphia, PA

the internet should be considered part of the commons like a city park to be opened and used equally by all

So some people and websites are not privileged over others. So I can control what I get and read and sign.

—Jane Telfair Stowe, Richmond, IN

If big corporations get their way there will be no fair advantage for the little guys and people who support them.

—Ramin, ,

The ability to manage my personal business is valuable. The ability to gain knowledge is crucial. The ability to see other points of view, not available in the U.S. is without equal in importance. Letting the ISPs control the bandwidth and manipulate it for their gain will hurt our ingenuity, ability to compete, and our economy.

—Robert Crain, Oak Park, IL

The internet is the only place left where I can research what is going on in the world. Big business already controls the mass media news. (TV and radio) Do not allow them to control the internet.

—Steve Burris, Stockton, CA

Keep communication, knowledge available to all.

—Pat Gilbert, Ogden, UT

I think people should have easy and quick access to any and all websites without corporations telling us what we should look at.

—Tonya Campbell, San Angelo, TX

Big business is not responsible enough to have the kind of control it wants to have and should not be trusted to do what is right...ever!

—Jon Hamlin, Austin, TX

The internet is one thing that makes America great, keep it great.

—Danya Jablon, Lynnwood, WA

In today's world, everyone needs access to the internet no matter the ability to pay. Find another way to restrict those who hog the pipes and slow things down for everybody else!

—Cathy Bledsoe, Portland, OR

I do not want to see the internet for those with a lot of money. I want to be fairly treated so that I too can use the internet so I can order things I need without having to allow those with a lot of money to be the only ones able to use it. Why are these people so selfish. If they want an exclusive internet & they are more financial than us, let them use that money to enable them to have it all to themselves. Being selfish is not the way to go, therefore think of others who enjoy using the internet just as much as them.

—June Askew, ,

A free internet is even more important for democracy to function for individuals than it is for the profit making corporate world.

—Scott Dalziell, ,

If net neutrality is not enforced it allows our corrupt telecommunication companies to turn the internet into a protection racket.

—Stephen Dawley, Fredericksburg, VA

To allow a free and equal press to thrive is a required feature of a true democracy.

Because I use Netflix, Wikipedia, Amazon.com, and a thousand small websites for ordering and viewing all kinds of content and products! Because I am a citizen who values all voices in politics, whether or not they agree with me, and I don't want to see anyone with (more) power to slow them or silence them! Because I want start-ups and competition to be able to enter the market and have a fair chance at becoming the next big thing! Because I believe that the cable cartels, Verizon, Comcast, and TimeWarner have enough of a monopoly as things are! Because I want the middle class to stop being pounded on and robbed at every turn and am tired of seeing the rich elite forcing us further and further into the margins!

—Lauren Sohaney, Houston, TX

The Internet is the primary means of communication for the vast majority of the world, a public utility if there ever was one. Do not put it under the control of a small handful of greedy businessmen.

This affects people all over the world; please keep the internet neutral and open for all to access.

—Dr. Jessica Edquist, ,

I am concerned that if real Net Neutrality is not protected my ability to freely access information on the Internet will be negatively impacted. I worry that Internet providers will become empowered gatekeepers of the Internet and it concerns me what the Internet providers will do with that power.

—Rita Mullis, Charlotte, NC

We need a strong and neutral Internet so that every American is able to exercise his or her right to freedom of expression and Democracy. The FCC has to stop prostituting itself to Big Cable and other carriers while on our Payroll.. You work for us remember?

—Rosemary Graham-Gardner, Manhattan Beach, CA

An open Internet encourages creativity, fosters inclusion, and thus promotes innovation.

—Erik Wentz, ,

International public learning and scholarship and the research and education that depend on these, in turn depend on equal access and exchange networking (net neutrality). At a time of global exchanges to address pressing global issues this must be preserved in the international 'body corporate' with the same urgency we'd use to maintain blood flows throughout an individual living body.

—Yoland Wadsworth, ,

It's like free speech, only free information to all for all.

—Robert g wills, ,

The World Wide Web was created to be free and open, owned by no one, without policing and censorship. It is under this same doctrine, and only under it that we the Human Race can hope to truly benefit from its existence. The Internet, as the ultimate system of recording and exchanging information ever created, becomes compromised only when those with power seek to increase their influence. Keep the Internet impartial, or condemn us to a totalitarian state.

—Ari Lewis, ,

It is the one place where all people who can get on the internet, which is nearly everyone, can be equal in their power to communicate and get things done. It allows all of us to have a voice no matter how much money we have. That is really amazing and sounds like what this country is all about!

—Paula R Casner, Portland, OR

The end of net neutrality means our media can potentially be controlled much more easily. Net neutrality is also an important factor in the ability for new entities on the internet to have a fighting chance against big established bodies.

—Zack Framl, Highland Park, IL

Net neutrality is imperative for free speech. The control of information and creation of fast and slow lanes on the internet will damage innovation and is a real threat to free speech. Do not allow the corporate takeover of the internet.

—K Bason, Saint Charles, IA

Net Neutrality is important because we are all the same person, all truth is one

—Phil, ,

I depend on equal access in order to properly research information for my work and the cable companies have no right to threaten that. I am the one who decides where I go and I deserve equal access regardless of whether or not the site submits to this obvious shakedown attempt.

The incumbents have dropped the ball so long ago that they're not even playing the right game now. Leave the network neutral so that a new generation of startups will have a chance to beat the legacy telcos at the game they have stopped playing.

—Erik Falor, Salt Lake City, UT

Don't just give it all away.

The internet is valuable to people of all walks of life and all income levels. It should be regulated as a public utility rather than a "cash cow" for the already wealthy.

—George Buehler, Pocatello, ID

As a crippled old man alone I live and communicate on it.

—Robert Hollingsworth, Sedan, NM

It's critical to freedom of thought and speech. The creativity that blossoms from the internet now has just begun. Provide protections so that it remains free and unlimited in scope.

—James Buchanan, ,

Net neutrality is the centerpiece of the communication systems We the People use every day of our lives. We shop, we bank, we answer surveys, we invest, we communicate personally...We the People spend hours on the internet every day and that's over and above the social networks. For many of us, our jobs depend on net neutrality. Selling net neutrality to big business will guarantee crashing businesses, more censorship and less communication. It's a bad idea all the way around! Please do not do this!

—Jo Anne Pinto, Casa Grande, AZ

Why change it. It works fine now. Broadband providers make enough money. We already have to pay to access the internet thru a provider and purchase equipment that's enough. Why should we have to pay more? The internet is free now and always has been. And that's how it should stay.

—Kim McDonald, Marysville, WA

The internet follows all the qualifications of a common carrier and should always have been designated as such.

—Mercedes R Lackey, CLAREMORE, OK

Internet must be equal to Neutrality as always has been. We all have the responsibility to protect the equal access and equal use of the Internet for all as it has been since the beginning. We can't continue allowing " big fat companies" to take control of crucial services that are for the people and belongs to the people for their own profit!

—Sonia Vázquez, Guaynabo, PR

I live on a fixed income and can't afford to spend money on something that should be free for all

—Joyce Webster, Reading, PA

Don't favor people with big bucks.

—Lynn Haldeman, Portland, OR

I have not seen a single rule by the FCC, in the last 14 years, that benefits the average individual! Anyone that was not influence by monetary reward would of course we must have net neutrality; the FCC being, above economic manipulation, will certainly maintain neutrality. They know it has worked perfectly well for consumers and even Netflix which has paid extra for a fast lane, says this will be bad for content providers who do not have their net work. In America, almost everyone who can afford any extra has internet. Internet is a utility. Company who can control the internet speed or content will have an incredible disproportionate advantage in profit and items that go through the internet. Do something for the people you are supposed to protect!

—Errol Ross, Chicago, IL

Freedom of Speech

—Fabian Borraccino, ,

Net neutrality is essential for a level playing field for enterprises. And as important if we want the Internet to enable free speech and democracy. Please, do not play with those who are bothered by those properties, who want to destroy it for their own interest. Protect it.

Broadband internet is today's telephone

—Janusz Strzepek, Boulder, CO

Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers, like telephone for example. We need to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites , apps and content that they don't like. Thus allowing them to force their views and opinions on their customers.

—Bruce Rutherford, Steubenville, OH

It's the last bastion of freedom. So many others have been taken away. The rich can almost control elections with their money and the laws they've had passed on their behalf.

—Jacqueline Wurm, Boulder, CO

The Internet is an inextricable part of modern life, and is necessary to fulfill many tasks in our lives at home, school, and work. The internet is not a luxury, it is a utility; a company's ability to restrict how we can use it limits our ability to function, not to mention the absurdity that a relationship between web users and web content makers can be interfered with by web carriers. Please, consider how important the rights of American citizens are, over the rights of cable monopolies to restrict our web use and promote their own content. It's the right thing to do, and precedence for it.

—Christina Clothier, Charlotte, NC

It seems that day after day, decision after decision, democracy as we know it takes a major hit, leaving us under an autocratic hierarchy. The ideas being proposed for the "slow lane rules" need to be severely altered or altogether abandoned. Please listen to the members of Free Press and help the world stand up for true Internet freedom and equality. The future of "The Net" depends on the decision that your group is about to make. Make a decision that is good for the entire world, not just the corporate fat cats and the extremely rich who stand to benefit greatly. They have enough already.

—Dean Holtsman, ,

Citizens all over the world have the right to unhindered access to a free, open internet.

—Sonja Hardy, ,

Net Neutrality is important as anything else will have significant negative ramifications namely: * Reducing the amount and quality of information made available for free on the internet especially to low income users who are likely to benefit the most from it. * ISPs will absorb any additional costs by tiering services such that the only person that will lose out is the average internet user as the costs and new restrictions are passed down to them. * Trying to enforce Net Neutrality is likely to be a legislative nightmare that will cost millions and ultimately be technically unsound as many users will likely start to setup separate new 'sub nets' of their own that will either need to be policed consuming large amounts of resources for no real purpose or tolerated in which case what was the point, the internet will just shift and fragment and ISPs will suffer as users migrate to new services. * The whole premise of trying to privatize the internet is fundamentally flawed the 'internet' is just a set of protocols designed to assist seamless communication and can be implemented with practically any set of computers. The moment ISPs appear incapable of providing reasonable service either a new company will appear to fill that gap or users will fill it themselves.

—Matthew Craig, ,

Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Greg Howell, ,

Corporations shouldn't be able to dictate the information & content I consume either by direct censorship or by slowing down my access to that content in the hopes that I give up and only get my entertainment and information from them. Net Neutrality is much needed to force corporations to treat all data equally, and not to cripple access to content they don't like or content that competes with their own products.

Thanks, Jason Bagg

—Jason Bagg, ,

Everyone should have access to the internet, not just people in highly developed areas.

—Kristen Minor, Portland, OR

AOL and other dialup ISPs were able to innovate because phone lines were common carriers. We must not prevent the next innovators, current broadband ISPs should also be common carriers.

—Andrew J Thomas, Logan, UT

To the FCC, Net neutrality is important to me because we should not have to be forced to pay more money to have our pages load faster. These enormous Companies just want to keep getting richer and this is their next scheme that they are trying to conjure up to do so. Large corporations should keep their hands off of it, before they ruin it. Many Americans these days live check to check and we don't need to give them more of our hard earned money that we don't have. Please don't side with them on this one. You're the only hope we have. Many American Consumers have spent hundreds or thousands on Hardware already this year, and to have them not be used to their potential would be a waste of money. In a nutshell, these companies are running out of get-rich schemes and by making us pay more money just to get our pages to load faster is completely unfair. The companies already have money and power on their side and now they just want more. Their greed is out of control unless you stop them. Thank you for your time, Sincerely, Jimmy Monti

The internet should be easily accessible to all. It should not be just a big business venture.

—Ann Connor, ,

Net Neutrality is a vastly important aspect of today's technology. Websites are quite literally how most of the world communicates information of all sorts. Whether it be a sweet message to your mother from college, or information on some form of rocket science for a college paper, to find that last inch of research for the cure for a cancer, or even just to watch that dumb cat video your friend mentioned, the internet is today's connection to whatever it is you're seeking. While I can see the thrill in exploiting that- in charging people for what they almost dearly need as much as gasoline, limiting something like this would be limiting the progress of society in general. People need their access to knowledge, to family, to humor, to entertainment. Taking that, limiting that, even, is downright selfish. You've already monopolized cable and the news, and our phones already have limits on what we can and can't do depending on how deep everyone's pockets run. Let us have our internet. Don't limit our ability to share and thrive and experience what is held at our fingertips. Even if it is just for that website full of cat videos, to someone, that's important, and for most of the people, accessing all of the wonderful learned things in this world that can be found through the unlimited websites is something we cannot live without. I ask you remove this limiting. Keep my cable, keep my gas, keep my phone, and whatever else you have your persuasive fingers in, but do not take my freedom to experience. You would squirm if I took the same from you.

—Lauren Layne, Jasper, GA

We don't need more rules that favor Big Business at the expense of individual consumers. Likewise, it's completely unacceptable to allow Big Telecom to block or slow down websites that can't afford their steep fees. Maintaining the open Internet is important for consumers and to a free flow of information. I'm frankly quite tired of being taken advantage of by businesses, not least broadband providers that already charge excessive fees and provide terrible service!! I'm appalled that you would bow to Big Telecom in this way. Your responsibility is to protect the public. How is your proposal protecting the public you are supposed to be serving? Please do the right thing - maintain true Net Neutrality and reclassify broadband providers as common carriers.

—Kristin Kerrigan, Newport Beach, CA

Freedom of speech, and fluid innovation and creativity.

The ability to conduct frequent research as well as learning materials for clients on a daily basis is crucial for my business. I spend a lot of time already in doing do, as I have many clients that are not available locally. Slowing down and inevitably adding cost to these endeavors would greatly handicap my ability to do business. I need to be able to set up web information for viewing and comments more than I do already. To add further cost, more hurdles, more time to these processes would make communication even more cumbersome and time consuming. I am a very small service company and depend on the internet. Net Neutrality is important to me because it will insure all internet users that they will be treated equally on the internet. If Net Neutrality is destroyed, corporations such as Verizon or Comcast who, unfortunately, control our access to the internet will be able to charge whatever they want for fast lanes. This will leave average citizens who can't afford these higher prices to suffer slower access to the internet. This can also keep start-up companies from being able to compete with the "big guys" who can pay the higher prices. It gives these gate keepers too much power. Net Neutrality must not be destroyed. Classifying broadband providers as common carriers is long overdue; not doing so has created other problems. The only "losers" with common carrier designation would be broadband providers who insist on stifling innovation. The ones who lose otherwise are innovative startups and consumers. Applying common carrier status to broadband providers is a logical and obvious solution, despite whatever spin they may try to put on their desire to stifle competition and innovation.

Internet moet vrij blijven

—RHasselman, ,

Net neutrality is not only important, it is necessary to the health and viability of the Internet as a means of communication, information, innovation, and business. The reason for this is because by allowing providers to create slow lanes it prevents the equal participation of internet users in almost any activity as Internet progress and innovation rely so heavily on access to bandwidth at current speeds. Essentially, slow lane control will allow anti-competitive activities to proceed, the ability to limit access to information by giving other information significant priority, stifling of innovation by only allowing certain businesses access to the bandwidth necessary for current and future technology to run. This amounts to interference in free communication aka free speech, and the open free market that the U.S.A. is built on since competition for online business can be influenced to a select few's favor. This is not unlike Microsoft's antitrust case where they were trying to prevent other internet browser companies from competing on their OS. This would also affect innovation in other industries. Consider that innovations HD TV were only possible due to the open access to bandwidth for all that is currently available. Please do not let these companies have this kind of power over the internet for their own interests. Let the internet be an open free market system like the U.S.A. under its democracy, not a closed and controlled system under which countries like China and North Korea currently operate.

—Raymond Walsh, ,

If your ruling affects the use of my internet here on the other side of the world, and also goes against every other country's idea of ISP responsibilities. then maybe you should rethink the bill, stop the terrible business practices of you two largest ISP's that refuse to compete in the same areas, and put to use all the fiber that you paid them to lay down and they for the most part refuse to use. stop governing by your pockets and grow a spine

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. I urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Mary Maureen West, ,

Without the internet I have no outlet to the world, I am disabled and hardly if ever leave home except for doctors appointments. I am sure there are many more people like me on fixed incomes that depend on the internet to bring the world to them. Don't shut us out.

—Clarence Dyson, ,

The Internet should be accessible. We shouldn't be forced to pay $100 a month to cable companies that have exclusive rights. First it was telephones, then television. Stop the monopolies and greed.

—Lin Gale, Seattle, WA

It is ESSENTIAL that broadband providers are considered common carriers. They are trying to have the best of both worlds. They want the advantages that come with being a "utility" company but then be able to avoid the rules in order to make more money.

—Benjamin Leyrer, Milwaukee, WI

Net neutrality is the First Amendment of the Internet, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data equally. As an Internet user, net neutrality is vitally important to me. The FCC should use its Title II authority to protect it. Most Americans have only one choice for truly high speed Internet: their local cable company. This is a political failure, and it is an embarrassment. America deserves competition and choice. Without net neutrality, a bad situation gets even worse. These ISPs will now be able to manipulate our Internet experience by speeding up some services and slowing down others. That kills choice, diversity, and quality. It also causes tremendous economic harm. If ISPs can speed up favored services and slow others, new businesses will no longer be able to rely on a level playing field. When ISPs can slow your site and destroy your business at will, how can any startup attract investors? My friends, family, and I use the Internet for conversation and fun, but also for work and business. When you let ISPs mess with our Internet experience, you are attacking our social lives, our entertainment, and our economic well being. We won't stand for it. ISPs are opposing Title II so that they can destroy the FCC's net neutrality rules in court. This is the same trick they pulled last time. Please, let's not be fooled again. Title II is the strong, legally sound way to enforce net neutrality. Use it.

—David A. Cruz, Phoenix, AZ

I support the open Internet, please do not allow Big Telecom to charge steep tolls for premium access — and block or slow down websites and services that can't afford the new fees. There's only one way to save Net Neutrality: The FCC must reclassify Internet service providers as "common carriers."

—David BOZON, ,

The internet has become a more important communications tool than the telephone. No one can dispute that. Without reliable communications all things grind to a halt. Everyone needs access to reliable communications. Within our own communities everyone drinks water from the same source and uses electricity from the same grid. The internet is a public utility and should be classified as such.

—Linda Bock, Sammamish, WA

Dear FCC Staff: Where does one turn to find the latest medical information on drugs and new surgical procedures to help those in need of course the Internet. How does one find information on a medical term given to one in a doctors office which is too complicated to explain in laymans terms the Internet. Who discovered this open highway of information no not the FCC but Mr William Gates . Who reached out to other companies to offer an introduction to this super highway of information right at ones finger tips William Gates so why should the FCC regulate it because it's electronics and runs throughout the country under different providers across the land. Who should allow anyone equal access to the Internet the FCC. How does one communicate with friends and neighbors at home or abroad the Internet. Communication is the key and the FCC should do all it can to make it equitable for all to access it not just doctors or lawyers or scientists or teachers but all individuals who wish to explore the super highway of many resources of information. The biggest annoyances on-line are ads and pay-sites, things that are unfortunately necessary for a lot of sites to stay up. If ISPs are allowed to use a business model that arbitrarily adds additional fees to keep sites running at a reasonable speed, those annoyances will just get worse, worsening the on-line experience for everyone, as I would expect many site owners aren't going to take that extra money out of their own pocket if they can help it.

The internet has become the global vessel for human knowledge and intelligence to coalesce. We need this connected wisdom to face the challenges of sustaining human culture on our rapidly changing planet. Diversity is the key to building a robust and responsive body of human knowledge and Net Neutrality is the key to the full diversity of human expression having access to the Internet. Please protect Net Neutrality.
—Will Tait, ,

Hello FCC and Telecom Companies, Millions like me believe that net neutrality is not just a right but much more than that, it's the real state of internet itself and how it should be forever. It's a concreted belief inscribed in our mind. I want to put it in the most nicest way but their claims and intend to control internet makes me remind these big telecom companies this " It's we who made it. Who the hell in the world are you to control and decide on it?" Internet will be free for all, equal speeded lanes to all, it'll be the ultimate place for freedom of expression, and the final word for unity among diversity in this world... and ultimately freedom is what defines us. There are millions like me who'll work for this goal, do what you can to prevent it dear telecoms. Good luck! An internet Citizen
—Able Vargh, ,

Read my lips. No internet slow lanes. The internet in the United States is slow enough already.

As a Canadian citizen I have no legal right to a say in US laws, but the internet is a global community and these laws affect more than just US citizens. Please consider the worldwide ramifications of limiting access to websites based in the US and don't pass these laws. The internet is shared by all of us, and can be a great unifier if it is allowed to continue to function as it has, uninhibited by beurocracy and greed. Thank you.

The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Wayne Bliss, ,

I believe this decision will be one for the history books. If you choose to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II, humanity will continue to evolve. If not, well that would stifle all forms of growth that the wide variety the current internet has to offer. This would be a step in the direction of control and blatant favoritism, which is not ideal for free expression, free communication, free business opportunities, free choices, free people. Being able to be free in the internet and be able to express my self is important because if I can't do it with the people around me then how can I do so ? Some websites that provide free service are very useful to us who can not afford to pay for the services. Reddit has been a big impact for my internet usage, for example, I'm constantly learning new things, I can Learn a new language, I keep updated with the news around the world. If you take away the internet from the people it will only be worst on your side. People will not just sit around weeping because of your actions we will take actions to keep the internet the way it is no matter what. Don't take away our freedom

—Itzel, ,

INTERNET NEUTRALITY IS FREEDOM OF PRESS AND SHOULD STAY AS IS.

—N C, Schaumburg, IL

Net Neutrality is important to me as it would protect the freedom of the Internet. The Internet is the last free bastion for free speech. Free exchange of ideas, hopes, and dreams. A way for the individual to be heard instead of drowned out by corporations and governments. Please keep the Internet free.

—Jonathan Ohlen, Middletown, CA

Net Neutrality guarantees all websites — start-ups, blogs, independent media, lolcats — an even playing field. It's essentially the First Amendment of the Internet. It's what has made it so revolutionary, and it gives all of us a voice. But the cable companies want to gut Net Neutrality to increase their profits. Without Net Neutrality, those corporations can kill websites by relegating them to slow lanes if they don't pay fees — or if they just don't like the content they contain. That threatens not only the Internet that we love, but the very foundations of a free society.

—Sandra Hensen, ,

Everyone has the right to net neutrality. A powerful self-interested few should not be allowed to prevent this

—Lorna Johnson, ,

Until a well discussed, open conversation is had between consumers, government, and service providers, net neutrality should be maintained. Our needs for Internet access have risen exponentially since it's advent, yet the legalities regarding service regulations have been as slow as one can imagine. The financial power is in the hands of those who have provided the infrastructure and service - and understandably so. But the end-user will always be the ones to empower these agencies and companies and net neutrality is the best starting ground to build a more sensible internet service road that includes a win-win for everyone.

—Adrian Moody, ,

The Internet should be free and open for all people alike and not controlled by big corporate ISP's who want to destroy it in the name of greed. Millions of small business people, internet marketers, and creators of the next big thing will be affected in a very negative way if you decide to allow fast lanes. That would say you are for the corporations and not the people and are not really interested in preserving an open internet as you have stated before. Please do the right thing and do not allow fast lanes and preserve an open internet.

—Joan Campbell, ,

To preserve freedom of expression and to improve innovation and investment, we need to reclassify broadband providers.

—Jo Elliott, ,

It's important for people who have either started companies, and then get the company online, or they start the company directly online. If the fast internet is only allowed to people and companies that can pay the hefty, large fee, then we as a country will not be able to compete with the rest of the world. Corporations and big business have changed our country and not for the better! They have changed the rules and the laws, and the changes are all for them! Our country is no longer "Of the people By the People For the people", it is now, Of the greedy corporations, by the greedy corporations, for the greedy corporations!!!! Our government has sold us to the highest bidder, and you all should be ashamed!!!! This country is not just for the rich and the wealthy! The FCC needs to reclassify the internet service providers as "common carriers", so the big ISP's like AT&T and Comcast, don't get all the balls in their court! The internet should be for everyone

—Madelane Coale, Bellingham, WA

World War 3 is shaping up to be a war of information control, governments and corporate bodies against the common people. You want to perpetuate this atrocity? And consider this: One way or another, those of us who really care about net neutrality WILL find the means to sustain it, legal or otherwise. You are NOT killing our greatest technological advancement of the last few centuries for profit or power.

Equal access to public utility systems is essential. The Internet is essentially the same as an electricity grid, natural gas pipeline system, interstate highways, etc. All should be available equally to everyone. —Del Ehresman, Toledo, OH

I'd like to see the internet service provision to be in as just as fair a playing field for Telcos as any other field of competition is for other companies. [I originally fancied a longer argument, which would also include pleas to regulate the internet as a utility as other developed nations have, but I ran short of time due to the quick arrival of the deadline and various extenuating circumstances. Take these materials on the honesty and aspirations of their intentions.] Three hundred seventy years ago this fall, the poet and scholar John Milton came forth before the English Parliament during their Civil War to argue against a system of licensing that threatened freedom of press. I am not one to make ostentatious parallels could I avoid it— certainly, we do not appear to be approaching a level of widespread unrest— yet one cannot avoid making certain comparisons across the centuries. The Parliament's Licensing Order of 1643 was an exercise of control: they wished to control revenues lost to piracy and industry turmoil, they wished to control what viewpoints were being disseminated into the public so as to protect themselves from scrutiny or outright protest, and they wished to control those newly-sprouting seeds of dissent that might eventually grow to usurp their authority. Their means of doing so would be to impose strict regulations on the media by which the public most readily accessed information and opinions in the near term, and in the longer, to review and remove those existing materials that might serve those same dreaded ends of insurrection, mild or severe. It was an attack on press that, should the need develop, could easily be turned into an attack on libraries. We, in our present circumstances, face what is effectively a translation of history to the present day: An industry seeks to recover lost revenue and, in doing so, is capable of extending that authority to constrain the flow of content to only that which is favorable to the defense of their position against present and future attack. What begins as an attempt to use the law to retrieve rightful income concludes in an assault on the world's library, for no nobler cause than to consolidate power in those whose only interest is in the maintenance of it, whatever the social cost may be. Myself, I am in little position to approach the level of rhetorical mastery exercised by Milton to plead his case. My schooling has been among the better available to a man of limited means and by contemporary standards, I would be called "educated," but as the public curriculum has scaled back its ambitions, I am unable to construct an eloquent argument with all the heft of biblical and classical reference. It is my hope, then, that in spite of these lamentable deficits and my citation only of Milton's tract, that the quality of my ideas is capable of shining through what is otherwise a pedestrian presentation. To attempt to frame my argument in the context of the freedoms of religion and will would likely result in an monologue more metaphorical (and perhaps metaphysical) in nature, so my intent is as much as I can to remain within the bounds of expression and the individual intellect. Likewise, certain conceits that form the foundation of Milton's argument are simply inapplicable here: We are not pursuing a licensing process that must be implemented consistently and equitably if it is to function without fault, but a course in which those who have the capital may be granted additional privileges beyond those money already grants to them. As the supreme court of our land has already emphasized in recent years, in cases such as Citizens United and McCutcheon, wealth equates to speech and the more wealth one has, the more valid one's viewpoints are, the more deserving they are of being promoted for the potential benefit of society at large. Amidst decaying infrastructure, one of the highest incarceration rate in the world, an education system that lags behind other developed nations, and widespread urban poverty, it is hard to imagine better use of billions of private dollars than to the sustenance of the status quo, but then I fear I am digressing outside of my original reasons for argument. We are perhaps not yet an oligarchy or plutocracy— it may still be debated— but a nation that ostensibly prides itself in its heritage of freedom and innovation. While we may find its viability a point of intense contention, we may generally agree that the American Dream, as articulated, is one that takes place in a level field where men and women rise to wealth and influence not from preexisting advantages conferred on them before birth as in more feudal and aristocratic societies, but from individual merit arising in their ideas, work ethic, or some happy amalgam of the two. As a culture of capitalism, this very often means that the individual succeeds in providing a necessary good or service to the people. The question may well be asked, to what degree does this proposed change of policy services the ideals we have clung to as foundational to our national character. For decades we have regarded countries that more readily seek to curb expression as "closed" at best, "fascist" at worst. They are a subject to our suspicion and disdain, particularly if we are competing ideologically or economically, true of Russia and China, less true of various dictatorships in Latin America and the Middle East that are willing to support our regional agenda. Anyone posing the claim that we would better ourselves through imitation of more closed cultures would be facing a tough sell, after all, we have spent several decades building them up as competition if not adversaries, particularly highlighting their restrictions as a point of distinction between the two sides. There is that pesky bit of cognitive dissonance to consider, that we would claim that further prohibitions in line with the practice of other nations would invariably lead to the more robust competition and innovation which is the line of our own national narrative. Even if we were not to address such concerns, then there is also, for consideration, that oft-prodded hornet's nest of citizens concerned with personal freedoms contrasted with the view of government as populated by administrative bogeymen. But say then, that we discard issues of mere philosophy, personal or otherwise, for it is practice that we are ultimately concerned with, and there have been unconventional transitions from means to ends in the past. But is it readily conceivable that a system such as proposed would prove a boon to the younger innovator or entrepreneur who might lack the raw financial means to compete? First we would have to consider their ability to get enough initial bandwidth to compete with established groups, which may effectively become monopolies due to their grandfathered wealth and clout. Secondly, we would have to consider the research tools available, long known to be drains on revenue and in some cases wholly reliant on donations and endowments. It is not merely the access to attention that may be stymied, but the access to the raw materials themselves, the knowledge that can be alchemized into improvements to our popular quality of life. Is this the fertile land we have mythologized into a dream? And what of the emotional stakes? Milton again is instructive: If therefore ye be loath to dishearten utterly and discontent, not the mercenary crew of false pretenders to learning, but the free and ingenuous sort of such as evidently were born to study, and love learning for itself, not for lucre, or any other end, but the service of God and of truth, and perhaps that lasting fame and perpetuity of praise which God and good men have consented shall be the reward of those whose published labors advance the good of mankind, then know, that so far to distrust the judgment & the honesty of one who hath but a common repute in learning, and never yet offended, as not to count him fit to print his mind without a tutor and examiner, lest he should drop a schism, or something of corruption, is the greatest displeasure and indignity to a free and knowing spirit that can be put upon him. To put down so high a cause as learning and the advancement of technology, and indeed the human race, for such a pitiful concept as faster ways to squander away one's money! For those are indeed the institutions most ready and interested in investing the extra capital for easier access. Milton continues: When a man writes to the world, he summons up all his reason and deliberation to assist him; he searches, meditates, is industrious, and likely consults and confers with his judicious friends; after all which done he takes himself to be informed in what he writes, as well as any that writ before him; if in this the most consummate act of his fidelity and ripeness, no years, no industry, no former proof of his abilities can bring him to that state of maturity, as not to be still mistrusted and suspected, unless he carry all his considerate diligence, all his midnight watchings, and expense of Palladian oil, to the hasty view of an unleisured licencer, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferior in judgment, perhaps one who never knew the labor of book-writing, and if he be not repulsed, or slighted, must appear in Print like a puny with his guardian, and his censors hand on the back of his title to be his bail and surety, that he is no idiot, or seducer, it cannot be but a dishonor and derogation to the author, to the book, to the privilege and dignity of Learning. To grant greater privileges on no greater basis than money, one is effectively handing the keys to those wholly engrossed in keeping things as they are, with themselves on top and the rest left scrambling for crumbs from the table. Hardly an atmosphere consistent with the belief that ability, genius, and personal industry are kingmakers. Instead, such vagaries as birth, luck, and circumstance. Further muddying the waters, while not license as such, the granting of fast lanes to those willing to pay would effectively act as sanction. There is no panel involved, no judicial process, but if this were all that were required for entry, we should soon see industries of more dubious morality serving more dubious needs because people are only too eager to spend on their vices. If you should like to have to answer for these things, by all means, but one cannot wholly divorce the media from the distribution.

Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. It fosters innovation and investment. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to abuse their market power. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking content they don't like by slowing down and interfering with websites and apps.

Net Neutrality is a must for any human being in the XXI Century. Those few who are fighting against it know how powerful a tool it is to keep the general public aware of their schemes. Net neutrality is the buffer that creates an equal playing field for anyone who uses it. It allows anyone to immediately start a business or supplement their own already existing one, it allows students cheap and easy access to information that would otherwise be throttled by a competitor, and it gives us unrestricted access to media, services, or software of our choosing. The loss of net neutrality is the loss of choice.

—Gage Bush, ,

Free communications are the lifeblood of democracy and our economy.

—David Helleman, ,

Net neutrality is the First Amendment of the Internet, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data equally. As an Internet user, net neutrality is vitally important to me. The FCC should use its Title II authority to protect it. Most people have only one choice for truly high speed Internet: their local cable company. This is a political failure, and it is an embarrassment. We deserve better, we demand competition and choice. Without net neutrality, a bad situation gets even worse. These ISPs will now be able to manipulate our Internet experience by speeding up some services and slowing down others. That kills choice, diversity, and quality. It also causes tremendous economic harm. If ISPs can speed up favored services and slow others, new businesses will no longer be able to rely on a level playing field. When ISPs can slow your site and destroy your business at will, how can any startup attract investors? My friends, family, and I use the Internet for conversation and fun, but also for work and business. When you let ISPs mess with our Internet experience, you are attacking our social lives, our entertainment, and our economic well being. We won't stand for it. ISPs are opposing Title II so that they can destroy the FCC's net neutrality rules in court. This is the same trick they pulled last time. Please, let's not be fooled again. Title II is the strong, legally sound way to enforce net neutrality. Use it.

—Trinity, ,

Do not let big corporations destroy the last frontier that is truly democratic and free in our society. The damage this would cause innovation, entrepreneurs and activism is incomprehensible. Also if you have internet connections based on amount paid it would be even more advantageous for trading robots in the financial market who could do all the trading before anyone else has a chance to, this is truly undesirable and dangerous on many levels. Best regards from a Sysadmin.

The internet is the mosat democratic platform to exist ever, now you want big business to rule this like it does everything else. I make my living building websites. If there is suddenly an uneven playing field then my business will not survive. The best content on the internet is not made by big companies it is made by highly creative individuals. If you shift the power to big corporations like Time Warner (who incidentally have been selling us overpriced entertainment for years) should not have control over this medium or any other. I guess it's fear that brought this proposal round. The big companies fear that their stronghold on certain marketplaces will dwindle. So they invent rules which protect them. Please do not destroy the internet, it has made some massive changes in the way we do things and will continue to do so if you do not tamper with it. I think the internet could save us from ourselves, reinstall democracy, give big ideas the freedom to roam, and allow freedom of expression to everyone in the world - which is their right! The internet has been free and accessible for all since inception. Many people use it for their livelihood, news, communication, research, etc . I find it outrageous that several large corporations now want to restrict access in order to pad their bottom lines. Allowing such an approach by concentrating access in a few corporations could even be detrimental to democracy. Foreign governments restrict internet access in the face of political dissension. Do the right thing and reclassify broadband as a utility.

—Tracy Fleming, Vancouver, WA

I am an American citizen living in Canada. I've been working in industries that have been directly or indirectly involved with the internet since 1994. Over the past 20 years, I have witnessed an explosion in innovation that would have been impossible with big internet providers having control over which businesses get bandwidth and which don't. The internet is much more than just streaming movies with Netflix. It is today's major source of news, communication, entertainment (games, user-created video content as well as commercial movie streaming), software delivery and knowledge transfer. It has truly become a common medium, more-so than the telephone ever was. Allowing a few large companies to make unbridled profit from it would kill innovation in the United States and North America in general, making the internet a luxury that few startups could afford, thereby putting us at a disadvantage compared to other countries that do not allow large providers to profiteer from what the internet has become. The growth of the internet is not finished and if we do not wish to be left behind, we cannot afford to deny common carrier status to the internet.

To me the beauty about the internet is it's ability to decentralize services. Many great platforms that make the world a more leveled, unified and inter-personal experience would not have been possible without net neutrality. I'm thinking about Couchsurfing, Bitcoin, Github, the Piratebay and the list goes on and on. With new technologies like WebGL it will be even more important to be sure everyone gets an approximately equal share of bandwidth. Killing net neutrality will spawn chaos on the web. Your plan will backfire quite hard if continued with. It will give more power to alternatives like GUNet, Freenet and Meshnet. Which I think would be a good thing, but it'll be quite a struggle.

Dear Tom Wheeler, My name is Benjamin Menant and I am a French & European citizen. I would like to notice you my fear about the recent (serious and repeated) threats against the Net Neutrality. As an humble net entrepreneur, the Internet is a wonderful source of wealth in which I can design innovative services & products. I need it to work and create businesses. However, I claim it: the Net neutrality is a prerequisite. As an humble democrat, the Internet is a wonderful place where I can access to free & open knowledges, where I can discover, contribute, discuss and share content or services that I want, when I want, where I want and with people I want. Likewise, I claim it: the Net neutrality is a prerequisite. As an humble human being, the Internet has shown its potential to help people in distress (See OpenStreetMap & Typhoon Haiyan / Yolanda) and to allow people to access freedom and democracy (even if, of course, it will be a long and difficult process). Once over again, I claim it: the Net neutrality is a prerequisite. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. PLEASE reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality. Thank you in advance.

The Internet as it exists now is a perfect reflection of our Democracy as it should be. To alter the way it operates, to censor content, to give greater control to those who already control too much; all these things would take something wonderful and tear it apart, just as our Democracy is currently being damaged by runaway campaign spending, attempts to silence the little guy, and the right's war against equality and healthcare access for women. The Internet serves a critical purpose in allowing all content to be equal. Every player has equal rights. Small business has a fighting chance to do well, and to enrich the economy. The internet is a Business Communication System (Sales & Marketing etc.), a Social Communication System, and an Affordable Educational System. It offers the world a more open platform for communication, learning and a method of introducing a wide array of innovative ideas and products that have been very beneficial to the US economy and the world i.e. Google, eBay, Netflix to name a few. So it leaves me surprised and wondering what ever enabled an idea of this nature to reach the level of consideration when it benefited so few and negatively affected so many? In my opinion, it enables a chosen few, very rich and powerful people to implement controls over a technology they did not create and the potential to violate many of the freedoms and rights as laid out in the US Constitution. Is it a lack of understanding of the situation, an exterior influence, or personal benefit??? The internet should always be open and free. People pay to access their providers network, any other fees are double dipping and are a joke and should not be allowed. The internet is about dissemination of information, not profits for the rich!

The majority of people in America have been pushed aside too many times! Why do the Corporations who already have huge profit margins need be able to demand more of Americans to include limiting our right to net neutrality? The big internet companies have continued a trajectory to increase the cost that consumer's pay and now they want to have tighter control to manipulate and dictate where people can search on the internet? I would like to know why the FCC would even consider doing away with net neutrality. The majority of Americans myself included have been subjected to ongoing deception because money and power are more important! Please rule in favor of the people this time. In doing so I believe that the FCC would be viewed as making decisions that are based on ethics to protect the American people.

As a disabled individual, I use the internet for just about every facet of my life. I keep in contact with my friends and family, receive medical instructions from my doctors, keep abreast of the news and weather and I also play games on line. The free internet as it is now has, and in my opinion, is working just fine. It helps to foster new businesses and further our economic growth. It gives everyone an equal chance. Please save "Net Neutrality"!

—Sonya Bligh, Havelock, NC

The Net Neutrality is key to having a free market on the internet. It is vital to our economy that innovation and entrepreneurship can continue to blossom online as it has for the last 20 years. Without Net Neutrality we will in effect get a planned economy akin to communist countries.

—Josef Svenningsson, ,

We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

The internet was and has been created to allow all users equal access to all the data available on it. By reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers under Title II you will protect real/Net Neutrality and keep it as it was intended.

—Aaron Griffin, Flint, MI

Ditch the idea of internet "slow lanes"! This is patently unfair! UNFAIR!

—Marilyn Rowland, Ithaca, NY

I use the internet every day, as does others. It has become a part of my everyday life. It would be morally wrong to allow the ISPs, or anyone else for that matter, to decide what content I should be able to access and how. I already pay for that access, and allowing internet fast lanes to become a reality would just allow the ISPs to double dip. The same companies making millions and more in profits each year. Meanwhile the everyone else suffers from a censored net. Please support and protect a neatral, open internet.

—Matthew Lefler, Avon, IN

Just to live a decent human life in this society, there must be access to fair internet use - common carrier use.

Equal voice money or no money

—Rohin vadera, ,

For me, the internet used to be great. Simple communication, gaming with friends from far away, reading news, looking at art, I love most of my time on the net. I also had a dream, a dream to play every single game in the 20th century in chronological order. I would share my opinions of the games, and share some nostalgic memories through my journey. It's most unfortunate for me to discover the slow lane plan. If the slow lane gets passed, it means that my videos probably need weeks to be uploaded, and there are people out there that are impatient. I'm against slow lane for the fact that it's a cheapskate tactic to get money out of people, and the fact that it'll hinder the production of my future game history videos. Don't mess with our internet!

—Lennart Grol, ,

The free internet is a modern miracle and restricting this would do great harm to the hope held by global communities to make positive change in a world in crisis.

—Anna Harpley, Sydney,

Dear FCC: We urgently need net neutrality for the Internet. Without it, we will lose what we have left of our democracy and of our ability to protect our lives and our planet. It is therefore imperative for you to classify the Internet as a public utility. For your information, I personally need net neutrality because I am very frequently online on the Internet, as I look for information that I need in order to protect the earth's environment and to support the development of renewable energy.

—Kenneth Ruby, Salem, NH

Net Neutrality is the only thing resembling a free press that we have left in this country. We can't let multi-national corporations get control of that too. They've taken over the rest of our news sources. The internet is all we have left.

—Neil Kijek, Gardner, IL

Part of why I pay the monthly fee that I do for internet now is not just for current access to the internet but for the provider to advance the technology and deliver faster speeds over time. I feel we as a nation currently pay enough if not too much for what is expected and for them to seek more money or else put us in an inferior group is segregation and yet another example of the gap between rich and poor. I have had enough and would like to see this move eradicated. I and many others feel the large providers need to re-examine their own business scheme before they can start hitting the customers up for more money. Please do not allow this injustice to happen, and make the internet be a fair place for all and not just some.

Tom Wheeler's proposed rules would allow Big Telecom to charge steep tolls for premium access — and block or slow down websites and services that can't afford the new fees. Those rules would clearly benefit big telecommunications corporations and damage start-ups and other small companies and websites. <http://www.albertpeia.com/112208opocoan/PeiavCoanetals.htm> <http://www.albertpeia.com/fbimarti nezcongallard.htm> Dear Senator Wyden: As set forth in my previous reply to you, if the government does what it purports to do as constitutionally required to do, then the following should at long last (quite embarrassing for the u.s. government, if they're even still capable of shame and deserved embarrassment) be resolved in accordance with law (I responded to Senator Warren referencing your email-this message has been truncated by yahoo and rather than waste time I assume you have the previous complete email): Thanking You in Advance for Your Time, Consideration, and Not Unreasonably Anticipated Long Overdue Results Consistent with Law, I Am Sincerely, Albert L. Peia Dear Senator Warren: I quite agree that results do count; and, almost doesn't count in anything but horseshoes. I'm hoping you can get some long overdue results regarding the matter set forth infra. I replied to an email from Senator Wyden and asked the same of him (because it can be done and should be done if america has any credibility systemically, which the most recent Gallup Poll regarding all three branches of u.s. government casts grave doubt upon): Thanking You in Advance for Your Time, Consideration, and Not Unreasonably Anticipated Long Overdue Results Consistent with Law, I Am Sincerely, Albert L. Peia ----- 6-29-14 Today at 5:52 PM Dear Senator Wyden: Do you think you can help get the following resolved; resolution in accordance with law long overdue if not for rather blatant corruption in the so-called process? I've sent the same request to both Senators Feinstein and Warren and as well, former FBI Director Louis Freeh as set forth infra: & nbsp; & nbsp; March 1, 2014 Louis J. Freeh, Esq. louisjfreeh@pepperlaw.com Pepper Hamilton The New York Times Building 37th Floor 620 Eighth Avenue New York, New York 10018-1405 Dear Mr. Freeh: I received from and then returned a call to a gentleman, James Licata, who stated that he was a client of yours concerning some substantial litigation involving the corrupt, illegal, and wrongful conduct of Alan Shiff, USBCJ, District of Conn., and Richard M. Coan. Indeed, I personally had directly observed, experienced, and was substantially damaged by such illegal, wrongful conduct by Shiff and Coan; such conduct including fraud connected to a case under Title 11, USC., a violation the RICO Act. Their corrupt and illegal conduct was pervasive, blatant and brazened without fear of oversight, including prosecution or determination/review by higher court (see infra). Specifically, Coan as Chapter 7 panel trustee had purposefully (or in the alternative, negligently) missed a filing deadline resulting in the dismissal of adversary proceedings (against RICO defendants, see infra) with prejudice by Shiff. Moreover, Shiff had previously made a fraudulently false representation concerning the dismissal date of a bankruptcy proceeding (over which he had presided) upon which fraudulent misrepresentation was predicated a spurious contempt proceeding against me with threats of prison by Deirdre Martini, Asst. U.S. Attorney, Dist. of Conn., despite the falsity of same. In addition to the aborted proceedings thereby consequently defrauding creditors and me, $800 was fraudulently extracted from me under duress. Appointed counsel for me in the spurious contempt proceeding was Robert Sullivan, Esq., of Westport, Connecticut. He, through arduous investigation and zealous representation as per ethical duty, was able to discern and represent by way of certification under penalty of perjury the falsity of Shiff's representation as to dismissal date. I thought it appropriate to contact you before reaching out to Mr. Sullivan as asked by your client, Mr. Licata, regarding this aspect of this rather sordid affair, further set forth in more plenary detail below. Parenthetically, I have initially through Congresswoman Roybal Allard, and presently through Senator Dianne Feinstein sought a resolution/settlement of my own RICO litigation in accordance with the RICO Litigation Summary in 5 pages as I was asked to prepare and send to the New Haven, Conn., field office of the FBI (under penalty of perjury, referenced and annexed hereto). I am willing to give a flat 1/3 fee for recovery/resolution in addition to expenses/ costs; and, hope quite possibly of your interest in so doing in light of your familiarity, though some time ago, with this pathetic scenario as set forth in the RICO Summary. Sincerely, Albert L. Peia ----- . This portion is really not relevant and may be skipped but you might want to know of same in light of your client's reference to Peter Mocco: { In or around 1975, while there was a tax credit incentive for the purchase of new residential construction, I bought a condominium in North Bergen, N.J., on Boulevard East, the incentive for me beyond the tax credit was the balconied view of Manhattan from my unit and proximity to NYC where I was studying evenings for my MBA (NYU, Finance, 1977) while working as a marketing representative for Hartford Insurance Group by day. Among the agencies (NOT the one referred to in the RICO Summary) I was assigned to handle was the Mocco Agency (sic) where Joe Mocco, brother of Peter Mocco, was the apparent operating principal. Joe Mocco was also the town clerk. Truth be told, they were not unlikable per se, and I found Joe Mocco to be somewhat of a 'wild man' in an amusing sort of way [ie., at a function at Hartford's Regional Office, indoor-sunglassed Joe Mocco came with his 'side-kick', Tommy English, who to some who remarked he seemed like a bodyguard (to know them would be more like 'dumb and dumber')]. I had met a very attractive North Bergen Italian girl at a place called 'The Bicycle Club' in Fort Lee, N.J., and began seeing her. Though not a virgin (that's something I just don't do) and though sexually very responsive, and though I liked her very much, there was no 'consummation' and the sexual frustration meant limited duration for the relationship such as it was. She had become very religious (which I considered very positive) owing to a previous experience for which she felt misplaced guilt (confidential details of which I won't even anonymously reveal). She insisted upon my attending a meeting presided over by Peter Mocco, then Mayor. She had what I believed was (as many in that town were) a 'patronage job' as an (low grades level) elementary school teacher despite her lack of college/educational certification. Peter Mocco in my view/perception seemed disingenuously over-animated (with more experience over time, I'd say, total b s). Of course, those in attendance thought him the 'greatest thing since sliced bread'. His biggest rallying point in what was seeming more and more a pep rally was that Jimmy Carter was coming to North Bergen for a political rally. At some point on one of my insurance calls/stops Joe Mocco suggested I get involved in politics and I did run for county committee as a republican and was elected (1976). At the first meeting it was clear Peter Mocco controlled both parties and I never went back nor ever received a penny (my first and only foray into ‘politics’ which I found difficult to take seriously and still think the adage true; viz., ‘those who can do, those who can’t become politicians or work for the government, federal, state, local, or on wall street’). There was talk that the Mocco father was a Godfather in the mafia which I never bothered to confirm nor cared about – this was the time of the allure of Francis Ford Coppola’s masterful oscar winner and the advent of the great actor as likable Mikey Corleone; viz., Al Pacino. I knew little more than that about the mob although the corruption extant in Hudson County was obviously pervasive. By 1978 my North Bergen residence was sold as I attended law school evenings (NYLS, J.D., 1981), and worked full time at a law firm by day along with teaching 1 or 2 courses per semester at Bloomfield College to help pay tuition. The last time I saw Peter Mocco he was on an elevator with Robert Del Tufo, his attorney, at 33 Washington St., Newark, N.J. (Stryker, et als?) where I worked on a different floor for a different firm. Note that in addition to Sam Alito, U.S. Attorney, I served by hand documentation of RICO violations on Del Tufo when he was state attorney general to mobster james florio. }

{ (It should be noted that FBI Agent Bill Lewis with whom I spoke regarding the disks/RICO matters is now Assistant Director In Charge of the LA FBI office) October 15, 2010 (*see infra { ultimately delivered by UPS }) Steven M. Martinez, Assistant Director In Charge Federal Bureau of Investigation, USDOJ 11000 Wilshire Blvd., Suite 1700 Los Angeles, CA 90024 Dear Sir: I enclose herewith 3 copies of the within DVD rom autorun disk (which will open in your computer’s browser) as per your office’s request as made this day (the disk and contents have been scanned by Avast, McAfee, and Norton which I’ve installed on my computer to prevent viral attacks / infection and are without threat). I also include 1 copy of the DVD as filed with the subject court as referenced therein (which files are also included on the aforesaid 3 disks in a separate folder named ‘112208opocoan’). The (civil) RICO action (as you’re aware, the RICO Act is a criminal statute which provides a civil remedy, including treble damages and attorney fees, as an incentive for private prosecution of said claims probably owing to the fact that the USDOJ seems somewhat overwhelmed and in need of such assistance given the seriousness and prevalence of said violations of law which have a corrupting influence on the process, and which corruption is pervasive). A grievance complaint against Coan was also filed concurrently with the subject action and held in abeyance pending resolution of the action which was illegally dismissed without any supporting law and in contravention of the Order of The Honorable Robert N. Chatigny, Chief Judge, USDC, District Connecticut. The files below the horizontal rule are the referenced documents as filed. (Owing to the damage to the financial interests of both the U.S. and the District of Congresswoman Roybal-Allard, viz., Los Angeles, the Qui Tam provisions of the Federal False Claims Act probably would apply and I would absent resolution seek to refer the within to a firm with expertise in that area of the law with which I am not familiar). The document in 5 pages under penalty of perjury I was asked to forward to the FBI office in New Haven is probably the best and most concise summary of the case RICO Summary to FBI Under Penalty of Perjury at Their Request (5 pages) [ricosummarytoFBIunderpenaltyofperjury.pdf http://albertpeia.com/ricosumm_arytoFBIunderpenaltyofperjury.pdf]. The correspondence I received from the Congresswoman by way of email attachment (apparent but typical problem with my mail) along with my response thereto is included on the 3 disks as fbicorrespondencereyes.htm . With regard to the calls to the FBI’s LA and New Haven, CT offices: There was one call to the LA office and I was referred to the Long Beach, CA office where I personally met with FBI Agent Jeff Hayes to whom I gave probative evidentiary documents of the money laundering which he confirmed as indicative of same (he was transferred from said office within approximately a month of said meeting and his location was not disclosed to me upon inquiry). The matter was assigned to FBI Agent Ron Barndollar and we remained in touch for in excess of a decade until he abruptly retired (our last conversation prior to his retirement related to the case and parenthetically, Rudy Giuliani whose father I stated had been an enforcer for the mob to which he registered disbelief and requested I prove it, which I did – he served 12 years in prison, aggravated assault/manslaughter? – and no, there is no Chinese wall of separation – Andrew Maloney’s the one that prosecuted gotti). In contradistinction to the statement in said correspondence, there is a plethora of information including evidence supporting the claims set forth in the RICO VERIFIED COMPLAINT (see infra). Such includes and as set forth in the case, inter alia, · A judgment had been entered in my favor in the case, United States District Court Case #3:93cv02065(AWT)(USDCJ Alvin Thompson), worth approximately now in excess of $300,000 remains unaccounted for and which could be used for payment to creditors, Los Angeles, etc.. · Counsel Robert Sullivan on my behalf documented by way of certification upon investigation that Alan Shiff, USBCJ, had falsely stated a dismissal upon which false statement he predicated a retaliatory and spurious contempt proceeding against me causing substantial damage, and for which he sought Judicial Notice of those and related proceedings as did I in some of my filings. · The Order of Dismissal With Prejudice by Alan Shiff, USBCJ, owing to Defendant Coan’s failure to file anything whatsoever by the court’s deadline causing creditors and me substantial damages: [Shiff Order of Dismissal With Prejudice on Coan’s Failure to File Page 1 Page 2] · Defendant Coan had filed an action against me to prevent me from suing him which necessitated me to fly to Connecticut for a hearing before The Honorable Robert N. Chatigny, Chief Judge, USDC, District of Connecticut, who denied Coan’s requested relief as to Coan but precluded my action against Shiff (although there is no immunity, judicial or otherwise, for criminal acts, ie., fraud connected with a case under Title 11, USC, etc.) . [transcript in pertinent part - <http://albertpeia.com/crossexamofcoanbypeia.pdf>] · Newly appointed judge, Maryanne Trump Barry, Donald Trump’s sister, was assigned the RICO case despite the conflict of interest in light of hundreds of thousands of dollars of illegal (drug) money being laundered through the Trump casinos by the RICO defendants, and despite my motion to recuse her which motion she heard herself and denied, and U.S. Trustee Hugh Leonard with whom I met personally refused to join or file a separate motion to recuse and not long thereafter left said office for private practice at Cole, Shotz, et als on retainer with the RICO defendants as his primary client. · Probative and evidentiary documents, affidavits, exhibits, including those turned over to FBI Agent Jeff Hayes in Long Beach, CA, had been given to Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Lacey with whom I met personally at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark, N.J., at which time Samuel Alito was U.S. Attorney, and went over said documents and their probative value with him. Within approximately a month thereafter upon inquiry I was told that Jonathon Lacey was no longer with the office, that the file/documents could not be located, and that there was no further information available concerning contacting him or his location. I thereupon delivered by hand, copies of said documents to the office of then U.S. Attorney Alito, addressed to him, with assurance they would go directly to him. In addition to being inept [I looked in on the one mob case he had brought, bungled, lost (accidently on purpose?) since I was suing some mob-connected under RICO and the court (I had known / previously met outside of court the judge Ackerman through a client) was absolute bedlam and a total joke since incompetent corrupt Alito brought in all 20 mob defendants (rather than prosecute one or a few to flip them first) who feigning illness had beds/cots in the courtroom along with their moans during testimony and had the jury in stitches. As much as I hate the mob, it truly was funny, if not so tragic.], Alito is also corrupt (and maybe corrupt because he is inept). After a reasonable (but still rather short) time I called to determine the status and was told that Alito was no longer with the Office of the U.S. Attorney, that he was (appointed) a federal judge, and that neither the documents nor any file or record of same could be located. Alito did parley the same / cover-up into quid pro quo direct lifetime appointment to the Court of Appeals, 3rd circuit, despite the absence of judicial experience or successful tenure as U.S. Attorney (Maryanne Trump Barry as well). This is the same Sam Alito that now sits on the purported highest court in the land. The real application of the illegal rule 'don't ask, don't tell'. There is applicable insurance / surety coverage and neither LA, nor creditors, nor I should continue to have been damaged by this brazened corrupt and illegal scenario, which should be resolved in accordance with the meaningful rules of law apposite thereto. Sincerely, Albert L. The corrected message immediately follows. Regards, Al Peia Allen Foster U.S. Department of State, Bureau of Consular Affairs Office of Legal Affairs 2100 Pennsylvania Ave NW, 3rd Floor Washington, DC 20037 Dear Mr. Foster: I had occasion to speak with Hudson County Assistant Prosecutor on May 6, 2013 regarding my correspondence to him with subject referenced enclosures and which is annexed hereto by way of email attachment as rastogipage1.jpg and rastogipage2.jpg. While he confirmed an open warrant regarding the matters as referred to in my RICO Summary Under Penalty of Perjury in 5 pages (for which I had sued complainants under RICO for the substantial monies I was owed by complainants therein; ie., their false charge against me therein theft by deception) I was asked to forward to the FBI, he also stated that the subsequent erroneous designation as a charge for distribution of a controlled dangerous substance was an error not entered in the system by his 'specific' office. He further stated he had just gotten back from vacation, that he had 'over a hundred cases', to which I responded that I empathized with him and that I was on his side. He referred me to Detective Distasio with whom I spoke regarding the error, as with Mr. Rastogi I stated they probably thought (this spurious charge) discrediting me was cheaper than paying what they owed me. I asked why I hadn't been noticed and given an opportunity to respond prior to the false charge and he stated he'd have to look at the file (after retrieving same). If history is any guide, it's unlikely that the precise identification of the perpetrator of the false input would be disclosed (though from my understanding such identification would be required for terminal access as per the N.J. State Police to whom I had been directed and with whom I also spoke). Mr. Rastogi says he is busy; and, I believe him. It is the summer (vacations) and as well, budgets are constrained. I haven't received anything regarding the aforesaid; but, as previously stated, I have no imminent travel plans but would hope, and by this communication assure that your file remain open, pending resolution. I will contact them within a reasonable time absent resolving this rather sad but typical, sordid, corrupt matter, euphemistically speaking. If the FCC makes the mistake of forcing content providers to pay for preferential treatment in their access to customers -- customers who are on fact already paying high fees to these internet service providers -- the FCC and users like myself will find the Internet stagnates into just the very few largest firms who can assemble enough of a customer base to justify the capital expenditures it takes to reach such an agreement. All other firms will be throttled out of existence, never able to grow large enough to even reach their customer base because of the necessities of this pay-to-play arrangement. I stand with the Daily Kos writer who wrote the above views because as a full-time scholarly book editor I rely extensively on quick access to a wide range of Internet sites. Allowing unaccountable corporations to take over will mean that my access to libraries, professional publications, references to scientific papers, the ability to convert kilometers to miles or dollars to pounds, and to check whether odd names are spelled correctly -- among a thousand other details -- will slow down my work immensely, and make it harder to bring projects in on time, and harder for me to stay in business. This is because under the proposed arrangement there will not simply be a normal lane and a "fast lane" that can be provided as a perk if you pay for it as a content provider. Because as we have seen for months the "new normal" Open Net is slowed down to the point of uselessness -- specifically as a means to extract (some might say "extort") a revenue stream from a service provider who wants "premium" access to their clients. This means that the only lane that will be usable will be the fast lane. And yet the "fast lane" that corporations will have access to is precisely the one everyone is using today. The problem is that those of us not in the fast lane will be paying twice to access information we need at slower speeds. This is not acceptable. As an Internet user who believes strongly in the importance of a free and open Internet, I urge the FCC to reclassify broadband Internet access as a telecommunications service. Saving Net Neutrality costs nothing -- not saving it will stifle the daily work of countless people, from innovators and musicians to every sort of small business. Finally, it is essential that the FCC use its full authority to reject the proposed rules that would allow Internet service providers to divide the Internet into fast lanes for wealthy corporations and slow lanes for the rest of us. I do not want a corporate takeover of the Internet. I ask FCC president Wheeler to reject all options for breaking up the Internet -- which has become the world's most irreplaceable workplace and communications crossroads -- and to insist that the net be reclassified as a public utility.

Because freedom of speech is one of the most fundamental rights and is in fact protected by the European Convention on Human Rights. I also think it is important to be able to discuss matters freely which the internet aids. Removing free internet access would prevent some if not majority people from using the services.

Information is empowering. All persons need ready access to the internet and should not have their traffic prioritized by their ability to pay! Net neutrality is income class-neutralizing and provides equal access and opportunity for everyone.

—Sheryan E. Chester, Tavares, FL

Control over the internet by any major cooperation is a major backstep for the growing, thriving, widespread use of the net around the world for they will slowly, but surely, control and censor, slow down, restrict, spy, and overcharge money for use of the internet. Such a thing would indeed happen if major telecom companies have control to do many things over the internet, as such killing the freedom and creative use of the internet, bringing fear in everyone, and dwindling start-up companies along with big ones as well. Net Neutrality is as important to me as to it's my family, my friends and many others out there for the things that it provides...and it's those reasons I mentioned above that I find Net Neutrality important to me... As it means the internet continues to be open, and not close and controlled, manipulated, censoring, and kicking out anyone of it because of something the telecoms/ISPs don't like. Please FCC, don't pass the bill that would destroy the internet of being free and for use by all, not to be overcharged and drenched in restrictions and censorship. Please don't...I only ask to please bring and improve upon Net Neutrality's flaws and more. That is all, thanks and good day to y'all.

—Shai-Dre Dillard, LYNN, MA

My work depends on an open internet. As an indie game developer, the ability for users to quickly and easily access the servers I use to distribute both the information about my games, and the games themselves, is crucial. I am not a big company, I can't afford to pay premium costs for extra speed.

—John A. Tate, Maurice, LA

—Julie Sheppard, ,

Do you work for us of for them?????

—johnWU, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me and to everyone because it ensures an unbiased access to the receiving and providing of information and services. If you allow the control of the internet for commercial reasons you deny the freedom of internet users around the world and allow for the control of the internet by those that stand to gain by it, whose reasons behind their actions are solely monetary. This would limit and distort the internet. You would not think of limiting a library. The internet is a source of information and services that should reflect open access.

As a Canadian in my sixties who has both observed and actively contributed to the growth of the World Wide Web and it's original principles of open access and a powerful, user based democratic media forum beyond borders, geopolitics and corporate control... I'm well aware that the FCC's ruling on Common Carrier status for the Internet will have a profound impact on Canadians' web access, as we are also faced with a Big Telecom Cartel lobbying for tiered services, broadband usage caps and a lack of competitive, fair market pricing options that has resulted in our paying the highest service charges in the G8.

Net Neutrality is very important abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. I was a targeted individual for 9 years, harassed and followed by the CIA for no reason other than being an ex US software firm employee. I also have Bipolar and was highly stressed. Net Neutrality is necessary as you will turn the American public on your company when they awaken to the seriousness of the situation. My privacy is enshrined in both the constitution of Ireland and America. America was founded on the concept of liberty and equality and you are break the laws of the land by your actions. I urge you to reconsider or I will take a civil suit against the Amerian govt.

—Brenda Hanlon, ,

Net neutrality is about fairness. Putting all the money and power into the hands of one percent of one percent of Americans is not about fairness, it's about destroying everything that helped make America number one since 1776. Pandering to the 0.01% means nobody wins. Net neutrality means everybody wins. It's that simple.

When we control the ability to freely exchange ideas, we silence the individual to the advantage of the corporation. The free exchange of ideas is the 'bridle' that prevents runaway greed and misinformation. Making this important freedom a commodity creates the pathway for wealthy interests to control all debates, and essentially propagandize freely. —Anthony Donovan, Glynneath,

An open internet is essential for my teaching of medical students and for sharing of my writing.

—Theodore Fallon, Wayne, PA

Without net neutrality, these internet providers will be allowed to work with big companies that provide valuable internet services to people, and they will start creating fast lanes (unequal lanes) to these big internet companies. Obviously this allows the big companies to have an unfair advantage over small companies and startups. The internet is EVERYTHING in this age, and it will only continue to grow. But how will new, or small companies, every have an edge if the big corporations are allowed to buy faster lanes. The Internet Service Provider should be investing into their own infrastructure, by lay down the same cables everywhere. The ISPs make plenty of money to do just that. Look at Google for example, and their Google Fiber internet service. Google is laying fiber everywhere so every consumer has the same high-speed connection. As an IT professional that had worked at several small businesses running their own websites off a few in-house servers- these are the type of businesses that will be impacted by allowing the internet service providers to think that they do not need to upgrade their own infrastructure. Please, make the right call to keep the internet open and fair to all business, big and small, and make the internet a public utility, or even keep it the same as it is now.

The internet is the place where freedom of expression is valued the most. You can't put a price on it. Global connectivity is what humanity is working on, a way to surpass the boundaries created by government and businesses. To put a price on that is worse than madness. It's oppression.

Stand with the users not with the corporations.

It's important to me because it's so vitally important to America. If you switch to a tiered system you're just handing the rich and powerful one more advantage that allows them to control every aspect of our lives and stifle the people's voices in their own democratic government. We're already an alagarchy and our only hope left is an open internet. If you don't keep it open, you are acting unAmerican and the result will be a country that is a mere facade of its former greatness. Do the right thing!

I use the internet daily for research and news. I'm a caregiver for two elderly parents, one dying of cancer. My research is done totally on the internet. What if the companies and sites that I use are unable to pay for highest speeds? What choices would there be? When I need answers most there is little time to waste. I believe that the broadband providers should be reclassified as common carriers to keep corporations from determining who gets the highest speeds on the net by paying the highest fees.

Wars were won and lives were lost to create democracy, the FCC has no right to dismantle the hard won rights of the people for the profit of the few. The internet is the pony express of our times and creating a two tier system is undemocratic and figuratively like putting the majority of us on mules while the elite run race horses. Not much of a race, so much for equality.

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. —Bev Beckstrom, Minneapolis, MN

Internet service throughout the United States is controlled by a tangle of regional monopolies, using their leverage to overcharge users for Internet access through antiquated cable and ADSL lines. As a result, America's Internet pipelines are ranked a dismal 19th-fastest worldwide. Enshrining ISPs as Common Carriers will not only prevent them from selectively limiting access to content, but also require they create contemporary and competitive pipelines to justify their rates for "high-speed" service under current law.

—Mike Conroy, Summerville, SC

This is a form of financial segregation. Our governments have failed us in providing equal opportunity health and education. Now they threaten the freedom of information and ideas. Perhaps if we tip the librarian we can get that book out faster or keep it a little longer. These companies did not create the content. Why are we allowing them to dictate how we access it.

—David Scully, ,

It is pretty rare in this day and age where a single person has the same access as a multi-national corporation to anything. The internet allows all equal access, which is how it must remain. All the innovation that has occurred over the internet because of equal access is phenomenal and astounding. Many of these fantastic innovations were developed by a single person. Do not change the equality of our access to the internet. Thank you.

The common public should not be held ransom for services and internet access that is so important in today's world. The free market may dictate however, when we have no choice, it is no longer free.

—Randy Stoner, ,

The fundamental premise of the Internet is that parties exchange messages broken into Internet packets (IP (Internet Protocol) packets) and all those packets are equal. The Internet providers (whether broadband or not) must have no right to do either of the following 2 things: [1] peek into the content of messages (which are private and exchanged between any parties on the Internet) wrapped into IP (Internet Protocol) packets. In particular, Internet providers must not peek into private messages and then based on the content discriminate (delay them, charge extra, etc.) The Internet traffic is point-to-point communication form that must be protected in the same manner as regular mail is. Any peeking or interfering into the content exchanged between two parties on the Internet must be legally equal to opening or interfering with the delivery of a letter (i.e. considered crime). [2] use IP sender and receiver address (and port) part of IP packet to discriminate parties on the Internet (delay or charge extra for their messages, etc.) based simply on who they (the parties) are. Giving Internet providers right to arbitrate the delivery performance of IP packets destroys the fundamental premises of the Internet.

net neutrality will not be exploited.

—Richard Kwok, ,

A free and equal internet is more than a right at this stage of our society, it's a necessity. If a "fast and slow lane" is allowed to happen we will essentially kill the internet we know today. Big companies can still advertise and gain clients on the internet we have now, but so can start up's and small to medium size companies. It's equal!! that's the point. With a "fast/slow lane" the equality is destroyed and the internet is, well just one big ad campaign. In other words useless.

—Brian Abernathy, Bergheim, TX

Internet is the no1 productivity and creativity tool of our age. Preserving it's entire value through net neutrality should be a priority.

The internet is the last bastion of true individuality, creativity and freedom left in the known world. Giving too much power to huge corporations and governments over it will only hinder, and eventually destroy all the good it does. Yes, the internet has its problems, but this is certainly a step in the wrong direction, and will do nothing to make it better.

i use the net everyday to keep in touch with news, friends and family from home (Canada). without NN, the net would be too slow and expensive for me and my family to use and do research based on web pages. It's a struggle for families to maintain access to the freedom of information and services that the net in it's current form provides. If prices were to rise, or the Net were to slow, it would seriously jeopardise family finances and overall life satisfaction.

Net neutrality is important in this day and age as everyone is beginning to need access to the internet. By allowing a "fast lane" ISPs will be creating an imbalance in who has access to the internet.

—William, Jefferson, MD

In the lifespan of The Internet, I have witnessed the rise of innovative digital enterprises that leaped over the hold of corporate media on the public imagination to provide diverse content that has invigorated dialogue and filled a cultural void. An open internet allows for documentaries to find audiences; startups to roll out concepts in Beta; writers, performers, artists and designers; and a new breed of "good news" to break through to audiences through sheer force of talent and persistent brilliance in the use of social media and web design SEO. This is the Internet that has captivated my attention and has allowed for rich forms of free speech to flourish through the global communication systems. I have discovered curated journals like Brain Pickings, open source libraries, and many many gems of individual, non-profit and upstart concepts to reach audiences, even in the absence of huge advertising budgets. The Internet was built in part with government funds and should be kept free and open to continue the crowdsourced evolution of global solution-making breakthroughs.

—Kathleen Sweeney, New York, NY

—Maria Miller, Grand Rapids, MI

Back room deals and closed talks to enact foreign government policies in Canada are not acceptable. The people need a voice in this! In my opinion, the Internet is the single most important human innovation since writing. It should not be policed, censored, or kept from an individual for any reason at all; least of all to benefit a foreign entertainment industry that can't or won't update its business model to stay with the times. The Internet is the only place on Earth where one can be truly autonomous. It allows for the free flow of information, ideas, conversations, innovations, ideologies, etc, in a totally neutral way. As we know it the TPP would allow foreign media powers to block our access to the internet and remove content at will if they feel one has infringed on their media copyrights, no legal system input required. Unacceptable. Stand up for free expression on the internet; don't let the TPP come to life anywhere!

To whom it may concern, I am writing this email on behalf of net neutrality and the people of America. Without net neutrality, the idea of capitalism is muddled by the ideals of profit and exploitation. Without equal access to websites and information, the people of this country cannot continue to thrive and learn in the way the internet was intended for. Please reevaluate this reform, and work toward maintaining net neutrality. Thank you.

—Jeremy Doxey, Oklahoma City, OK

Freedom of speech, expression and information through the internet should not be throttled in the name of making a few dollars for large corporations. Nobody "owns" the internet, and therefore governing bodies should not be allowed to set restrictions on it in a bid for profits.

The Internet is probably the single greatest thing to happen to human communication, innovation, and development in the past two centuries. It allows people to freely share ideas, their own works of art, and perspectives with each other. It is also a vector for vital services for parts of the world where things such as encyclopedias and dictionaries are hard to come by. Introducing a legislation that would increase net segregation puts all these great things at risk, and restricts the to those that are privileged. It is not the right path to go down.

If it isn't broke, don't fix it. Why the FCC would allow the internet to be auctioned off to the highest bidder and then let that entity charge what they will is easily answered. They want to end the most democratic roll out of some of the most advanced technology in the world. The internet and net neutrality have been instrumental in the discovery, distribution and delivery of content the world has ever known. The end of net neutrality severely cripples the internet's functionality and serves it up to the highest bidder.

Net Neutrality is one of the most important freedom movements in play. Without it, corporations will run America as they do the medical and food production systems. Please protect your fellow Americans from this greed.

—Reid Manchester, Altamonte Springs, FL

Net Neutrality has created an open platform for the biggest revolution of innovation in the twenty first century. That innovation has kept the US at the forefront of the world in technology. Once you start throwing barriers to that free test bed of innovation you open the door to other countries taking over the lead in technology. US companies won't be at the forefront anymore. If you put tolls across the US highways what kind of damage would it create to the economy and the free flow of goods we now experience.

—Jessica Durkin, Pittsburgh, PA

Net neutrality is very important to me. I can't comprehend why a government would accomodate the needs of multi billionaire Telecoms over that of it's own tax paying citizens. Affordability to everyone should play a role in decision makers. Why is bloating profits for rich Corporations on your priority lists without considering the average tax payer? Please, show some compassion and rethink some of the contracts to include the RIGHTS of every citizen.

I was in the Peace Corps in the early sixties, worked for the United Farm Workers, was active in my union, worked for a tenants organizing committee, was a member of Mass Coalition for Occupational Safety and Health. volunteered for progressive political candidates, among other activities. Now that I am older and technology has changed, I am educating myself on environmental, health, social justice, economic and political issues by using the internet and signing petitions I support. I have always loved my country, but am finding it harder and harder to be proud of it. If we lose Net Neutrality it will be one of the final nails in the coffin of democracy. We will hand this country over to the one percent and the corporations. Please do not take my hope of returning America to the country it once was by taking away my minuscule effort, and those of millions of other Americans, of changing this country one click at a time.

—Joan R. Banfield, Pembroke, MA

The net was developed with tax dollars and should not become a gift to corporations. This will put us farther behind other countries that have more and better net access, which has a negative impact on education and productivity.

—Allen Perkins, Berkeley, CA

Net Neutrality is not simply a matter of privacy or accessibility for me- it's a matter of livelihood. I work with a company that focuses on providing our customers with custom, web-based objects from ads to websites. We depend on our Internet access for almost every part of our business, from testing to implementing to trouble-shooting. Allowing Internet service providers to define the type of Internet access allowed to a person through "premium" fees would not only force our company to reconstruct its entire setup, but it could very well break it financially. This company would not be the only one, either. Even businesses that do not create web-based products would be hit hard by the destruction of Net Neutrality, for almost every company has become connected to the open Internet in some part, if only for convenience sake for actions such as payroll, file preservation, and even basic work communications. I honestly believe that forcing individuals and businesses to follow a "premium Internet" setup controlled by only a few select corporations would not only create a collapse of free expression via the Internet, but an economic one as well. Therefore, I ask that broadband providers are redefined as "common carriers", and that these same providers are henceforth prevented from slowing, speeding, blocking, or in any way having control over Internet access and web content.

—Claire Perry, Erlanger, KY

The internet should be like the highway system: Same speeds for all who choose to use the public roads and toll roads for those willing to pay extra for faster speeds and/or access. In no circumstances should public roads speeds/availability be reduced to accommodate toll roads.

—Lee, Austin, TX

I may not agree with what other people want to access on the internet, but I absolutely agree with their right to do so. No corporation should have the right to limit the creativity, ingenuity and desire to learn of those people who may someday be running those same corporations. Corporate censorship/information control conflicts with principles of democracy

—Wendy Priestley, ,

The internet is a vital communications platform that has changed the way we live. It's open nature leveled the playing field for entrepreneurs and creatives. In it's current, unbroken, state of the internet is crucial to our economy and culture. LEAVE THE INTERNET OPEN FOR ALL.

—Anthony Perri, ,

Free and unimpeded communication is the cornerstone of our American democracy. Don't let the wealthy take this away from us the way they have already been allowed to hijack our democratic political process.

—Linda Todd, Taos, NM

The net should be free ... no-one should dictate what we should or should not see on the world wide web!!!

—Sandra Mortensen, Buffalo, NY

It's probably about time the FCC did something for the the average citizen by protecting their rights instead of giving it all to the money pigs every time. It would be the democratic thing to do. Wouldn't that be quaint.

—Mr. Jim Whitworth, Ucluelet, BC

We already pay some of the highest fees for some of the slowest internet. If this goes through it may finally be the straw that broke the sheeple's back. Leave our internet alone!!!

—Deb Polowy, ,

DEMOCRACY requires the free flow of information and ideas. In contrast, "fast" and "slow" lanes would DISCRIMINATE against low-income speakers and people expressing viewpoints outside of what Big Business wants. THAT WOULD VIOLATE THE SPIRIT AND PRACTICE OF DEMOCRACY. I am APPALLED that the FCC would even consider this corruption!!! I implore you -- FOR THE SAKE OF DEMOCRACY -- to PROTECT NET NEUTRALITY. Reclassify broadband providers as COMMON CARRIERS under Title II.

—Glen Anderson, Lacey, WA

I run a small business online. I make a living running my online store, but I can't afford to pay for fast lane access. This will have devastating effects for my business and many others in my situation.

—Sina Fallahi, ,

We don't need censorship or higher costs.

—Dean Catalano, Deltona, FL

The internet is a bastion of -- and megaphone for -- equality worldwide. Very little else benefits equally across economic divides. You can prevent internet access becoming yet another instance of 'haves and have-nots' seen in so many domains of life today.

—Eileen Thompson, Springfield, VA

The internet belongs to everyone in a democratic society.

—Lucia Dutton, ,

I want the freedom to access any information I want without interference from carriers

—Patrick Gremo, Elgin, IL

The Internet must remain equally available to all Americans all the time, regardless of wealth. Providers must not be given the right to charge extra for faster access or for specific access. Please preserve Net Neutrality for good.

—Debra Evon, Minneapolis, MN

Free expression is a democratic right that we fight and died for But democracy has become capitalism which slowly tries to to control the populace and is no different than communism or a dictatorship (except that the later 2 reveal thier intentions while capitalist are subversive in thier intent

—Kim Gowryluk, ,

Net Neutrality is what enables fair competition and the free flow of ideas and information so essential to a democratic society. Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality, not the "Orwellian" nonsense being pushed by telecom and their man on the inside, Tom Wheeler.

—Philip Johnston, Scotts Valley, CA

Make the Internet equally available to all. Do not allow Big Telecom to control its use by charging steep tolls for premium access, thereby giving special use to the rich only.

—Joan Fahey, ,

The Internet should be there for everyone to use, regardless of how much money they have. Tim Berners Lee took nothing for his invention; he intended it for the world to use. Honour his intention; preserve net neutrality.

—Chris Jacobs, ,

Without Net Neutrality, there is no Net; not even "slow lane".

—Rafael Cárcamo, ,

If you (the FCC) make the Internet any slower, I shall dump my computer. It already is an aggravating thing. What you should do: Make the Internet for all users FASTER. In the meantime, keep Net Neutrality. There should be no classism in the Internet community. Neutral is the word.

—Mr. David Bentley, San Francisco, CA

I am disabled and need the internet to have some kind of contact with people and the world dont take it away or make me a second class user!

—Daniel McCutcheon, ,

How much money do you and the powers that be really need?! Does everything have to come down to dollars and cents? Does this match the idea of Democracy that YOU want to live under? I do not! What has happened to common decency? When did the 'rule of law' apply only to those without funds? Please, I urge you to keep the web neutral; keep neutrally it accessible to all. There are already far too many costs applied to this global collection of knowledge; this knowledge will free our children to make a better world of the one we have certainly made a mess of. Do the right thing; make good decisions, consistently, and teach the young how to do it; how to be responsible, and take action when needed. This is one of those times...

—Rick Vincil, ,

It is important for innovation and democracy

—ben Schwartz, Wassaic, NY

It is important that freedoms to communicate are maintained. Common carriage would keep powers safely in the public domain.

—Diana Simpson, ,

I live in a Rural Area and we only have one provider who can service us with "Real Broad Band" (I do not consider satellite as real Broad Band, because of the time lag... Have you ever tried to write an email on Gmail over satellite? Try playing a game or watching youtube on one of the satellite providers.) The local "Mom & Pop" company who provides us service has to buy it from ATT, it is a hard enough job for them to get us good service using Long Range Fixed Wireless, don't let the big companies make it even harder for us. Money runs the world for the big telecoms and they are spending a lot of it to get you guys to let them "Manage" bandwidth, Please ask yourself "WHY?" The only reason is that if they are able to decide what runs at full speed and what runs in the slow lane.... will make it able for them to make more money! I would not feel so strongly about this if any of them were willing to spend that Money to improve service to customers, however they have shown they are not willing to do this. If the big telecoms were investing the profits in Americas Infrastructure as they claim.... We would not be ranked #9 in the world (Ref. "State of the Internet Report" Jul 2013) And we would not have dropped to #12 in the same report as of 1st Qtr 2014. We do not rank in the "Top Ten" for any of the speed ratings, we do however Rank #1 in the number of IPv4 addresses in use. So in closing, we have more folks trying to use the internet and are falling steadily behind in connection speeds. This shows that the oversight of our large Telecom companies is not working for our citizens, but it looks to be working well for the Telecoms Stock Holders and even better for the CEO's of these companies. The Question I have is "WHO is the FCC working for?" Right now it looks as if the FCC is working for Big Telecom not for the Citizens of the USA.... Sorry guys, but data is data and "The State Of the Internet" Report is considered to be the best data available to the public of the World.... (Hint: go read it at <http://www.akamai.com/stateoftheinternet/>)

—Steve Tindle, Rogers, AR

It isn't right or fair to put companies before people.

—Jessica Crees, ,

An open internet is freedom. Turning freedom into a product that can be bought and sold to the highest bidder, especially at a time where the top 1% already has a strangle hold on our democracy is one of the most anti-American things one can do right now. Stop hating America and leave our freedom alone.

—Edward Tasick, Brooklyn, NY

Everyone who uses the internet is an investor and therefore deserves to have a say in how it should be run, and everyone feels differently. Taking Net Neutrality away will not have the desired effect. As a broad band customer, the cost I pay is so absurd that I am strongly considering discontinuing my services if something is not done soon!

—Jenn Nelson, ,

Yes it is.

—Louis, ,

Keeping in touch with family is paramount here. We have the freedom to live in another country with the net. Don't take our freedom away from us

—Marya, ,

—Valerie Martin, Acushnet, MA

We all know that our entire civilization will depend on this framework - let's do it right.

—Melissa M Charlesworth, ,

Not only the Disney's should have access to the net. If the little people can't have access then the information age will suffer.

—Christel Haeck, ,

Access to the Internet should be as widely available and equally accessible as land line phone service is today and has been for decades. Metered billing makes sense, but I fear that allowing separate infrastructures for those who can pay will leave everyone else behind.

—Ian Malcolm, ,

I am 22 years old. I just finished my degree in computer science; I am currently in debt (because of school), and I am relying on an open internet to FIND A JOB AND EARN A LIVING. Don't pull net neutrality out from under my feet. Every person I know would argue that net neutrality is important to them! Why doesn't this issue show up in the media/news at all !?!?!

—Sean Budning, ,

It's vital that we keep this one only medium that is not controlled by the power of money open to everyone. You should not only maintain net neutrality, but you should also bring radio and tv back out from under corporate control, as your legislative mandate suggests.

—Jary Stavely, Fort Bragg, CA

Please help us keep internet alive for the average citizen.

—Neil Cannon, ,

The airwaves belong to all the people. They need to be free, so that we all have access to the information we need and want.

—Judith Deverell, Champaign, IL

The inventor of the internet wanted a free and open internet. Keep his legacy free and open, as he wished.

—Babs S., w.palmbeach, FL

I pay taxes. The internet was created by the Federal Government using our taxes.

—James P. Murphy, Middlesex, NJ

The Internet should not be "Pay to Play." Internet access should be available for everyone, without a slow lane.

—Melissa Simmons, Cincinnati, OH

Controlling the internet by the government WILL just KILL a FREE and open exchange of information. The existing LAWS for FRAUD and corruption should be ALL that we need to control what is put on the internet, because it would STOP false information and devious inform from being foisted on the public to try to persuade people to do what THEY want done. AN internet FREE of government control is a LOT BETTER for a FREE people than a corrupt internet that ONLY let ONE side of a subject to be LET put out for people to see, hear, and digest.

—Donald McCormick, Portland, OR

Because the internet belongs to the people not corporations.

This is a freedom & privacy issue. If broadband providers are not reclassified as common carriers we lose all that is good about the internet. it stops being a place where everyone, rich or poor, can gather.

—Anne macklin, Sundre,

I use the internet for information on medical issues, plant information & many other topics that I wouldn't be able to find answers anywhere else. Leave the internet alone. Actually, I don't see how you have the right to change it to benefit big companies!

—Willow Feigum, Glenwood, MN

Internet bandwidth is a resource that should be available to everyone equally.

—Kristofer Bitner, ,

The internet is a public utility and deserves to be treated as such. Kowtowing to wealthy business interests will not benefit the American people and will kill the possibility of growing a large internet business from a small one. Without Real Net Neutrality, companies like Amazon wouldn't have been able to grow from a small operation into the largest retailer in the United States. Do the right thing and support Net Neutrality.

—James Searls, Morgantown, WV

Neutrality is essential to the free use of the Internet by everyone.

—George & Emily Upham, Germantown, NY

Encourages private investment and innovation. Provides the greatest opportunity for economic growth/prosperity, and job creation. Preserves the stability and continuity of current facilities-based broadband competition policy. Keep the "competitive free market... Internet... unfettered by Federal... regulation." Keeps the Internet user-centric and highly responsive to user needs, wants and concerns.

Net Neutrality will keep big business more creative than controlling

—Rejean Emard, ,

The internet is a common resource for all. After integrating many parts of our lives into the internet, how can we now accept a multi-tiered 'haves and have-not' arrangement? It is not only unfair, but inefficient.

—Luis Armstrong, ,

we don't own all the internet

—Joshua Hambek, Kearney, NE

This is a first amendment issue. Freedom of expression must be protected!

—Cheryl Anderson, New Albany, IN

It's our modern day free speech. If the telecommunications companies try to control the internet they will stifle innovation. I'm a web developer and I don't want to see the limitations of my skill set be determined by people that aren't in my field. The internet service providers only job is to do exactly that... provide internet service and that's all. That involves adjusting to certain trends for competition. Just because At&T and Comcast don't want to innovate and compete with companies like Google doesn't mean all of us have to suffer.

—Ray Chavez, Skokie, IL

Why wouldn't we want net neutrality?

—Jean Dahlheimer, Hamel, MN

I've been taking online classes for the last four years. Net neutrality means better opportunities for my family.

—Maurice LaTier, Talent, OR

The internet is not the Government's business.

—Benoit Aubry, ,

Net neutrality must exist. We cannot allow web site views to be greater for those with money to pay for it. The internet must be free.

—Shayne Pearce, ,

Less exploitation by internet providers, affordable internet for all, innovation, fairness. Internet belongs to the world, not big telecom companies.

—Peter Pinto, ,

It allows me the freedom to explore and express myself in an open, uncensored medium that doesn't play favorites.

Without neutrality the primary news system of the USA will become hostage to corporate interests only.

—Dawn Storrud, Las Cruces, NM

The Internet must be fair for everyone.

—Ratchaphon Manosuthi, ,

A free and open internet is vital in this age of the world connecting online.

—Gary Craig, Yelm, WA

Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Edmundo, San Juan, PR

Stop the greed.

—Daniel Vallee, ,

I am a retired person on a fixed income. I am also visually impaired and my primary source of interaction is the internet. Letting big companies have the ability raise prices indiscriminately would make it more difficult for the less fortunate to have access.

—Bernard W Miszczak, Milwaukee, WI

Net Neutrality = Freedom of speech. Perhaps that's what you wish to clamp? I hope you will be proud with the decision you make for the rest of your life.

—Robin Junga, ,

Content discrimination will create a non-free marketplace and contribute to stagnation by making it harder for new players to compete with entrenched ones. It should be the other way around for innovation progress and the common good.

—Jack Bates, ,

Cable companies are already overcharging customers for their established infrastructure. The need for regulations is critical as "cable" has become a utility for every American. The proposed cable company mergers will cement the fact that there needs to be regulation in an industry dominated by just a few companies. The unchecked actions, related to fees, of the few cable companies can only lead to higher costs for consumers and the cable company's customers. There is no demand from the consumer for Fast and Slow lanes on the internet. The requests to create the "lanes" are from the cable companies so they can increase their charges with no remorse or recourse.

—C Baker, Newnan, GA

Internet service should be provided as a public utility --without tiered 'pay-to-play' type obstructions/restrictions/denial of service.

—Richard Johnson, Bellingham, WA

Equality

—Tricia Lee, New York, NY

The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Ken Korol, ,

For me, Net Neutrality means I have fast access to downloads like everyone else. I think it's dishonest and unfair to bring in a two tier system whereby those who have the money to pay for that fast access get preference and relegate people like me who aren't rich and powerful to a slower access that's much like being in a dole queue waiting to be served. I urge you not to create a 2-class system because the internet is uniquely people-friendly --that's its tremendous appeal!

—Kendall C Lovett, Preston South,

I use the Internet for entertainment and a home-based business. I don't have cable TV, and only watch PBS and Netflix, since I want to be responsible with my viewing habits. Net Neutrality is supported by the vast majority of Americans. Please don't side against us in order to favor corporations. Even if businesses have been declared to be 'people' by SCOTUS, there are still more of us than there are of them, and we deserve to be heard. Thanks for listening!

—Rebekah Awood, Dearborn, MI

As an independent writer who relies on my own website to showcase my work the massacre of net neutrality could destroy any hope I have of actually making a living from my writing in the hopes of one day no longer living in poverty.

—Chris Canning, ,

I'm commenting to urge Chairman Wheeler to scrap the FCC's plan to allow Internet service providers to charge for preferential treatment. These rules would destroy Net Neutrality. I urge the chairman to throw them out and instead reclassify broadband as a telecommunications service. This is the only way to restore real Net Neutrality.

—Ralph Andreas Schmidt, , libertàdi che hanno paura x volerci tacitare???

—Barbara Pagliani, ,

I am scared that business are taking over something that is free and open and there is a secret agenda that is not being disclosed.

—Peter Prewett, ,

I am a small business person who does a large part of his work via a website. The thought that my traffic will be prioritized to be slower than a company's that can afford the higher tiered service will have an impact upon my ability to continue to do business. If telcos need $$ to pay for infrastructure, they can charge higher rates for their metered traffic. Metering seems the fairest plan -- pay for how much you use. That way, I pay a little for my traffic compared to MSN who pays a lot for theirs; but our packets have the same ability to be delivered...

America already has enough big businesses exploiting the common people. As somebody who uses the internet to search for and contribute to work on a regular basis, I can say that creating "internet fast lanes" is completely unfair to others like myself.

—K Hamilton, ,

Dear FCC: Net neutrality is important to me, and our family because in this day and age of all the spying going on, it is one more step in retaining our privacy while on the internet. I have even read of companies releasing search data with names attached in the U.S. Keep the net neutral. Thanks.

—Robert Ciemniak, Kitimat,

As a retired academic librarian I know only too well how important it is to maintain open access for ALL. There should not be a fast "lane" for those y who pay more.

—Laura A Lane, Philadelphia, PA

The Internet has shown how it can make the world a better place by making information easily available to anybody. I think that this is something sacred; letting telecom companies prey on it would only slow down progress, innovation and the general enlightenment that tomorrow's societies rightfully deserve.

—Pierre, ,

I want to protect free access to the Internet for everyone in the world.

—James D Keeney, SARASOTA, FL

The democratic nature of the internet is at stake. It's strength is the ability of all people and businesses to access information. The economic and cultural impact of a skewed or two-tier system will be felt around the world. This service needs to be protected as a common carrier service to keep this from being further compromised by corporate interests.

As consumers and citizens in general, the individuality of their station gives them much less power in uniting their funds to propel lobbying than the Telecom Companies. Net Neutrality must be preserved by the governments of the different countries to prevent overpowering these companies in their control of information, education and communications. The road ahead will be determined by your decisions concerning Net Neutrality and a disolving government structure will ensue, to the profits of corporate citizens, if the wrong choices are made.

—Samuel Dragon, ,

I am very concerned about the impact of the destruction of net neutrality, not just for the United States but globally. It stands against the most fundamental democratic principles of the internet as we know it and would set a dangerous precedent that could, through international trade agreements and such likes, only too easily spread. I am deeply worried about what a powerful tool the threat of a slow lane would be in the hands of those who would readily silence voices in society that disagree with their views or economic interests. No company should have that kind of power. I urge you to consider Free Press's proposals and not kill net neutrality.

—Lisa-Marie Zoller, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me.

—Ms Maria F Wright, Harrisburg, PA

Democracy has flourished by the free transmission of ideas and its toleration of dissent, the unusual and eccentricity. The absolutely wonderful thing about the internet is it's open and free nature, from Amazon down to an individuals blog, all are on the same footing - And this is the way it was meant to be. And, frankly a corporate build internet would be pointless and boring, you see, it's the input of the millions of people everywhere that make it the wonderful medium it is, I can read about woodworking from Joe in Texas and fishing from Bill in New York, I can share my experiences with Jill in Vancouver, I can buy books from Amazon and Teacups from Japan; the internet is the doorway to the world and has liberated people, enlightened them and made them laugh, please don't now put bars across that doorway.

The internet was built as a collective to further the progress of humanity, adding arbitrary limits is nothing but greedy and shady.

—Blake Mattson, ,

Because the only way the western hemisphere will remain relevant on the Internet and not get grossly surpassed by other countries is to keep the Internet free and open for the smaller guys to be able to compete on the same footing as the big guys who can otherwise muscle them out. Think strong and hard about what you're doing and what this will mean for your children.

A free internet is essential for democracy

—Lesley Currie, ,

Customers paying for service are more important than corporate control and mega profits. Customers deserve respect for without them there would be no need for the internet service providers to exist.

—Deborah Klement, ,

It's important that all websites are equally available to end users of the Internet. Giving big telecom companies carte blanche to artificially degrade service and carve the Internet into cable-TV style "access packages" or "premium experience" plans is precisely what consumers DO NOT want or need. This is an issue I will be voting on in the next election.

—Geoff Francario, Richmond, VA

We cannot allow big organization to control content or internet access. Internet was developed by all of us. Not them.

There's enough profit and inequality in the world, please let us keep this communal, global space as free from these issues as we can!

—Janine Theriault, ,

The internet is for the everyone to experience the way it is now. Changing it will destroy creativity, innovation and freedom of information. This is the only line people can find out the truth! If we lose this, we lose accountability, we lose accountability, we just lose.

—Clemente Benedicto, ,

Without true net neutrality, we are putting the brakes on our future capacity to compete with the rest of the world.

—Paul Ratz, New Rochelle, NY

Do not allow corporations price out smaller businesses or the people into using slower Internet speeds. Keep the internet open to all at the fastest speeds available.

—Alain Febles, Chicago, IL

The Internet is one of the most important resources in the modern age. Libraries, educational websites, self-help websites, peer to peer trading websites, businesses and foundations that would like to make a footprint on the internet should not be denied the best possible avenues for connecting to people. It is crucial for the development of future generations and societies from around the world that the internet is the best and most reliable resource of information.

The decisions you make affect the whole world. Please do not set this precedent. It will destroy the internet as a free source of information and offer up the last avenue of free expression into the hands of the same few who already own our newspapers , radio and television stations.

—Paleeta Bronwasser, , we are equal in all aspect, we deserve the same considerations and respect.

—Yvon Cheff, ,

How many people do you think want for profit corporations to control content and access to the internet?

—Steven Berge, Martinez, CA

It would be easy to see the true unfairness of this if it were a real highway with cars on it and you were only letting the most expensive cars drive on the highway or gain access to the majority of the lanes and banning or hindering all the economy cars, older cars, beat up cars from using the highway (or gaining access to the majority of the lanes). I do not understand why it is so hard for you to understand how allowing net neutrality to become eroded away, allowing those who can afford premium access to shut down or block slower websites or simply just charging more money for using the net is a bad thing. Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect true Net Neutrality.

—Laurel Cordier, Camano Island, WA

My ISP already charges $170/month for FTTH (Fibre To The Home). I work in networking and require a fast Internet connection. I cannot afford to pay even more. The Internet should be affordable and accesible by all; not restricted to the rich. Think of future generations and what the Internet will be used for...

—Adam DeHann, ,

Open and free communication is a the hallmark of Democracy, Capitalism and a core foundation of American Culture. Why do you want to ruin that for the internet?

—Damien Rowe, ,

I don't want to see newer, smaller companies get crushed by larger groups that can simply pay more for bandwidth.

—Gregory Grondin, ,

The internet should be somewhere that businesses and individuals succeed on merit, not by hamstringing competition with less financial resources.

—Amanda Chase, ,

Seems like more power and control are being given to the rich few. Let's go for a more democratic internet.

—Jesse Brown, ,

It is for us as Americans to stand up for what's right for us with our voice and not let big business or the government controller us. we buy the products from big business and we pay the governments salary. so we need to unite to make it right that we are first before them not them before us without us there is no them. I love my government but at times I don't feel that the people are being put first and that's sad!(Can you put the people first please in the name of GOD)

—Richard, Slidell, LA

Save The Internet! Save Net Neutrality! This is an International Issue. Telecommunications need MORE Regulating, and/or Nationalizing.

—Mark Alan Dellavecchia, Campbell, CA

In a world (more so North America) where the rich get richer and the poor get "poorer" what you are proposing to do will only cause more debt in the world. We pay more then enough for a decent Internet connection as it is. To make is have to pay different fees depending on what we want to access on the Internet is just down right foolish and proves that the government doesn't give 2 shits about the people and is only interested in taking more money from us. I work for a certin cable company in canada and I pay a monthly fee for Internet and I refuse to be told what I can and can't access on the Internet. That's like me walking into a corner store telling me what I can and can't look at when I want to buy something. It's like telling me that I have to pay just to look at the chip section to see what kind of chips I want to purchase Makes sense right ? Wrong.

—Paul Dickson, ,

I am a small business owner

—, Boston, MA

I don't pretend to understand all of the nuances regarding this bill. what I do know is that the internet is a powerful tool and segregating it into controlled segments possessed by select groups is dangerous. It's true the openness of the internet can foster illegal activity but making it more controllable simply makes it easier for corruption to take place. Even with the best intentions, an internet whose power can be levied by one group and not another, you can be sure corruption will follow. At least with an open internet no one has an edge over the other. Additionally, with increasing numbers of people turning to the internet for their news and with countless numbers of conversations being conducted through e-mail, chat, text, etc. it becomes an infringement on un-biased media and freedom of speech. Please re-consider your position and protect Net Neutrality.

—Jeff Kelly, Williamsburg, VA

let us all have access to information

—Sandra Reeves, Houston, TX

Because it's not up to big corporations to decide what information we have access to - Internet belongs to everyone.

The internet isn't yours to control. Reclassify Internet service providers as common carriers NOW !!

—Rhys Mansbridge, ,

Net Neutrality is very, important to me!

—Robert J. Thornberry, Wills Point, TX

The internet should follow freedom of speech and information. If you control the flow and content then you are controlling peoples voices and how they learn.

—Rob Pomroy, ,

The net is the Beginning of a Type 1 Society on the Kardashev scale , if you restraint it , you slow down human evolution.

—Tommy Marquis, ,

The Net is a Public Utility intended to be used by All Americans not just those who can pay for Faster service.

—Mary Bell, Amarillo, TX

Freedom of Speech. This is WE THE PEOPLE VS. another corporation, trying to make another wrong decision, for their own interests. This is about money. The people already pay for these services. Service in some areas is not so great. Some areas still cannot get service. The FCC wants to give more power to restriction on everyone including the poor. The poor that cannot get or afford these services already. This action will make your world smaller. The FCC is trying to slow the flow of information ultimately, for their own gain. We aren't agreeing to paying more.

—Daniel Bedell, Lynnwood, WA

I see no reason to give the fat cats even more money than they have now. It is obvious that neutrality benefits us - thry want even more money than the too much that they gouge us out of already.

Without net neutrality, quality educational information may become inaccessible to our children, teenagers & young adults. If good educational materials can remain available, people will be able to improve our society, invent new & more efficient medical & technical ways to benefit people.

—Jennifer Bowman, Denver, CO

The Internet belongs to us, no corporation is allowed to regulate what does not belong to them. The FCC is not a protector of Net Neutrality and will soon pay for its lack of judgement and incompetence.

—Julien Noiseux, ,

The US should not turn our internet over to BIG BUSINESS! This is WRONG!

We already pay high fees and have slow internet in the United States now. Why do we need to pay more to move slower?

—Damien Armstrong, Hagerstown, MD

As far as I'm concerned as long as we have internet than Net Neutrality is a human right! No corporation or government has the right to take that away from anyone. The people are the ones that make the internet so great so all the people have a right to it. Keep the internet opened and free!

—Mark Kennedy, ,

The changes would be discriminatory!

—LeeAnne Evanovich, Las Vegas, NV

everyone deserves equal rights on the internet! Th e other way is just catering to make the rich richer!

—Cheryl Hogan, ,

The internet is a community based forum. To give control to the providers will undermine the very existence of this tool. Please keep net neutrality NEUTRAL. As soon as money and power get involved it will cease to be what it was meant to be.

—Nate Harnack, Erie, CO

Net neutrality must be maintained so everyone has equal opportunity from and within it. Without this, Access providers can create a bias in its users by giving better access to certain services or stores that pay them for the privilege. The effects wouldn't stop there as many avenues of expression would close shop as a result of reduced or lost ad revenues that they rely on to keep their sites open. Start ups and existing small businesses would be damaged irreversibly by this and could result in the loss of free expression online as this would make a alternate avenue of censorship.

Equality on the largest communicative network is fundamental to the American dream.

—Samuel Rosean, Littleton, CO

Net neutrality seems to me to be a serious factor in maintaining a healthy democracy. If that which the US is founded upon is worth anything, then it's worth safeguarding net neutrality.

—Allan D. Gagnon, West Haven, CT

I frequently take part in e-sports and am hoping to make it to a competitive level in the future. Providers shouldn't be have the power to affect this or any resources available to me, or anyone else for that matter.

They already make enough from the rates they charge, they should not be allowed to throttle different sites. The ISPs should have to guarantee my connection rate that I pay for.

—David Daniels, Jerusalem, OH

Net neutrality is the First Amendment of the Internet, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data equally. As an Internet user, net neutrality is vitally important to me. The FCC should use its Title II authority to protect it. Most Americans have only one choice for truly high speed Internet: their local cable company. This is a political failure, and it is an embarrassment. America deserves competition and choice. Without net neutrality, a bad situation gets even worse. These ISPs will now be able to manipulate our Internet experience by speeding up some services and slowing down others. That kills choice, diversity, and quality. It also causes tremendous economic harm. If ISPs can speed up favored services and slow others, new businesses will no longer be able to rely on a level playing field. When ISPs can slow your site and destroy your business at will, how can any startup attract investors? My friends, family, and I use the Internet for conversation and fun, but also for work and business. When you let ISPs mess with our Internet experience, you are attacking our social lives, our entertainment, and our economic well being. We won't stand for it. ISPs are opposing Title II so that they can destroy the FCC's net neutrality rules in court. This is the same trick they pulled last time. Please, let's not be fooled again. Title II is the strong, legally sound way to enforce net neutrality. Use it.

—Jordan Porter, Kittanning, PA

I agree with the statement above wholeheartedly. The uncensored and equal access to all content on the internet is an integral part of freedom on communication of information and the only way we have as a people to combat the increasing corporatization of our country and our world. Don't let them take this away from us as well.

—Jennifer Riehl, Hancock, MI

Money should never be the core of what decides the fate of free-flowing information. Humanity can only continue to evolve when all data is transmitted equally.

The internet belongs to everyone and no-one. It especially does NOT BELONG TO BIG CORPORATIONS AND BIG GOVERNMENT!!

—Francis Kokot, ,

Our country was built on innovation and when you condemn most of the population to work without the access of net neutrality you condemn our innovation. Our nation is starting to feel like a "third world" country where only the rich has access to anything. This is wrong and we need to start supporting the people that will then support the corporations instead of supporting the corporations who will not support the people.

—Wendy Stevens, Charlotte, NC

Having this action of a slow Internet creates a class system of rich and poor Internet users. In our democratic countries I see a loss of equality. I fear a loss of our rights in freedom of choice.

—Malcolm MacNeil, ,

Equal access for every one from rich to poor. Information is not a privilege, it is a right.

—Danielle Gauthier, ,

Net Neutrality is important to me because I can research any topic I choose, despite whether or not it is endorsed by so called authority figures. The internet has become an Oracle and a revolutionary tool for expanded public consciousness. The internet in it's current form has the potential to enable a more peaceful world through a forum whereby citizens from around the world can communicate and share information easily. Most things in life have the potential for misuse in the wrong hands but the internet should be kept free and open to facilitate the emergence of a more enlightened public

—Xanthe Butcher, TUNBRIDGE WELLS,

The internet is all about free speech. If you let corporations stifle the voice of the people, our democracy is in serious danger.

—Marie N Burton Norrell, Fort Worth, TX

Big Telcom getting privilege in no way benefits the common man. He will eventually get screwed. Plain and simple.

—Mark Diamond, Leonia, NJ

Free means free, not controlled by any person, company, nation, government. The net was created by individuals!.

—Melvin Taylor, Sacramento, CA

I want a fair and open internet, and destroying Net Neutrality would compromise that.

—Bryan Porecki, Boulder Creek, CA

Net Neutrality ensure freedom of speech to everybody. It is not the responsibility of an ISP to decide which website is important and which should be slowed down. Thanks.

—Jonathan Fleury, ,

Information should be there available at the same speed for all, not because a company can pay more to get their message out faster. We have a level playing field online and it should be kept that way.

—Mark Carlson, St Louis Park, MN

I believe that it is best for everyone to classify ISPs as Common Carriers. It is the highway of information and putting restrictions only serves to marginalize young entrepreneurs and the flow of ideas and inspiration.

—Bruce Armstrong, ,

I'm currently unemployed and the internet is necessary to promote myself. With a tiered internet pricing scheme, I'll be locked out.

—Daniel Phasey, Siloam Springs, AR

An open internet is what spawned this massive growth in technology. Ideas should be free and internet is the best way to share over great distances.

—Chris Hunter, Syracuse, NY

You know why... i dont need to add some...

—Yves Larochelle, ,

We must maintain an equal playing field for all incumbent companies.

—Mark Jeffrey, Boston, MA

The internet was made to serve several functions: to help, to inform, to inspire and to teach. If Net neutrality is killed by you (Comcast, Verizon, all carriers that are in on this) then these four functions will simply die with this. The internet will be a barren wasteland where the only beneficiaries will be Comcast, Verizon and the other carriers/companies that are in on this. I will not stand for this, and I'm not alone. This is inhumane, unpolitical, and to put it in Laymen's Terms, NOT RIGHT. Please do not kill the internet.

—Aaron Rodriguez, Whiting, IN

Because the alternative is just one more nail in the coffin of liberty and freedom.

—Eric Pye, ,

Net Neutrality Is so very important to me. I am working at a start up company and I would have significantly less hope of turning this into long term job without a free and open internet. I can't stay in contact with many of my friends and family without the use of the internet. I would have a harder time paying my bills without the internet and craziest of all I know of many people all across the world even who would consider themselves more a member of the internet community then their own countries. The reason the internet has become so completely important and integral to our everyday lives because I has been and should continue to be a free and open platform for all sorts of communication and economic development the internet should not only remain neutral but ISPs should be classified as common carriers and the internet should be deemed a public utility it is so incredibly important that this become a reality.

—Jacob Meixner, Milwaukee, WI

Fundamental to internet. No caveats

People's Right of Free Speech and Free Press is more important than Corporate Profits!

—Elaine Becker, Roanoke, VA

I find it hard to believe that this has even become an issue! Of course the net should not be in the hands of corporations!

—Maggie Shields, Worcester, MA

As a university instructor, I often tell students that they are of the first generation who have the choice to become creators of cultural products as readily as they are consumers of culture. Net neutrality threatens that extraordinary opportunity. Please do not destroy it.

Our internet NEEDS to be designated a public utility...this is a no brainer!

—Valerie Brinton, Fillmore, CA

The internet belongs to the people.

—Tyler Worrell, Niles, MI

Slow Lane speeds and Fast Lane speeds should only apply to the Freeway. The Internet needs all Fast, all the time for everyone who uses it!!!

—Shawn Matthews, Oakland, CA

Access to internet should be universal right

—Arlo Armstrong, Oakland, CA

Too much of society is already owned by the affluent - rich. The internet is the ONLY tool we have to provide knowledge, business tools, marketing and HOPE to those on the edge of the chasm, being available in schools and libraries even when it is not present in the home. To limit internet use is to cripple the fastest growing population in the world - the poor. It would be a morally reprehensible and irresponsible move AGAINST compassion and human rights. This issue is beyond "profit and loss" for major corporations - it addresses equality, education and provision of tools for self-sufficiency for those who really need them.

Our Democracy depends on it!

—Barney McComas, Berkeley, CA

We need access to all information in order to be a democracy. Do not let the wealthy control another part of our lives. Killing net neutrality is a other step in the taking over of our country by the wealthy and powerful. Stopping access to information is how dictators start taking over a country!

—Sue Harvey, Bolingbrook, IL

Neutrality is important in this case to give the WOLD a voice. Without neutrality, private industry and not as free go'vts will put their restrictions on it as well; personally I would not enjoy a new edited by North Korea, Iran, Syria, China, Israel, etc. The fact that the US government is wasting the time and money of the tax payers on this non-issue, continues to show the favoritism that is bestowed upon the corporate industries that feed the back pockets (& any other pockets that are accessible) of the government decision makers that have been voted in by the people to supposedly represent "their" interest.

—Christopher Miller, Haiku, HI

I hat limitations and control I love the free country USA.

Because of information sharing.

—Rosen Vlasev, ,

The internet should not be hindered in any way shape or form as it is a fantastic resource for many things, from school papers to scientific research, venting ones personal opinions to working remotely. To change the way it is to a new model that prevents access to things destroys the very reason for which the internet exists: free unfettered access to any topic known to mankind, be it other cultures you may never experience first hand, enjoying a video or two, or collaborating with people around the globe for a larger goal. Please don't do something asinine like this, it will only make people less intelligent, and line the big companies pockets further.

—Mick Evans, ,

To the FCC: There is almost no aspect of people's lives today that is not overtaken by corporations. We are unable to compete as individuals or small businesses with the communications giants that have our government (officials) in their vice-grip, and controlled by their massive financial power. Please represent the voices of the people without which there would be no real internet...just another great big commercial enterprise suffocating individuality and real creativity. Thank you, Rachel Kelley
—Rachel Kelley, Santa Monica, CA

Because freedom of expression is what the internet was built on and is the reason for new innovated ways of thought and expression
—Mike Jensen, ,

Net Neutrality is the best way we can protect innovation and small business in this ever changing economy. I believe that hindering that will result in irreversible damage being done to businesses of today and tomorrow. Net Neutrality also effects the way we do research and creating a two tiered internet would create a class system in a place that is supposed to super seed the status of a person. Proper research, development, and innovations cannot be achieved in a world where we penalize people for having less money than others. America was built on the foundation that everyone is created equal and that everyone has the right to make their own opportunities. Creating an internet tier system in America goes against those values, and sets a standard for the rest of the world in a time when America needs to show it can still lead properly.

Scientists like me depend on the Internet to access and share huge volumes of data. Universities and researchers cannot afford to pay extra to access an Internet "fast lane" - we would be relegated to the slow lane by commercial providers seeking to extract profits from what is now clearly an essential public utility. American scientific competitiveness would be substantially harmed by any policy that departs from Net Neutrality.

—Reba B., Gainesville, FL

The popular consensus is against measures that would destroy net neutrality. While there are further distinctions to be made, a government should be serving its people; bottom line.

—Raed, ,

Net Neutrality is good, but competition is better. Allow access to the "last mile" on the cable bringing access to the people and end the stranglehold that Comcast, AT&T and Time Warner have on our bandwidth at large. We, the people are being forced into inferior internet access at higher process than almost anywhere else in the world because there is NO competition. I can get TWC at my house or pay another company to buy access to TWC. Verizon isn't allowed in my area, Google has been stymied in courts when they try to bring fiber to cities. TWC, AT&T, Comcast stay out of each other's way and divvy up the American people's business without presenting us a choice and maintain a stranglehold on the market. In what way is this blatant monopoly practice considered a fair and open market? America has been, and will continue to suffer in the international standings until competition is allowed and encouraged in this critical field. Don't make my kids grow up in an internet oligarchy. When they grow up and choose their careers, I'd prefer if they didn't have to leave the USA to move forward in the global marketplace.

I use the internet for most of my communications and my primary news source via podcasts as well as for information services. My cable company is my phone service provider as well as my internet provider. This is all about communication and those who provide the pipelines for communication should be classified as common carriers. As a low-income senior, my communications costs are a struggle every month, yet even Social Security and Medicare refer seniors to their website for information so having access is essential. Most of the websites I utilize will not be able to afford the "fast lane" if internet neutrality is undermined and I won't be able to pay for fast-lane service.

—Judith Blair, Ithaca, NY

The purpose of the internet was for unfettered communication between parties. It was not to discriminate between users.

No one entity should control access to internet. Everyone should be able to access high speed internet--not just those with special privileges.

—Maria, North Hills, CA

I use the internet daily to search for employment, to keep my skills sharp by taking online classes, to keep up with daily news, to read my emails, to pay my bills, and to keep track of my finances. My children use it for school and assignments. The internet has become a necessity to me like a basic utility needed for daily life. Without it I would have to spend more money to pay my bills by mailing payments. If the telecom companies get their way and the internet is not reclassified as a basic utility & the Internet service providers are not classified as common carriers I will no longer be able to do this. The internet should not be owned & controlled by private corporations who already show that they hike their prices because they have no competition & currently stay out of each others' territory just so they can artificially raise prices for cable, phone and internet. It doesn't take much of an imagination to see where they would take their control if they were given it over the internet: higher prices for faster speeds is already their standard modus operandi. It will become unaffordable for all but the very wealthy.

—Doris Adebanjo, Chester Springs, PA

It's basic to free speech in our country. It's wrong that monopolies like Comcast, Verizon, AT&T, and TimeWarner are trying to take CONTROL of free speech.

—Sally Milow, Downers Grove, IL

What is this, a communist regime? Back these people up and uphold one of the most basic of human rights - the freedom of speech. No one has the right to dictate what we can and cannot access on the web (within the realm of decency). To introduce a "slow lane" is to sabotage technological AND social development for what? Money? Yet again society is being asked to bear the weight and consequence of corporate greed. Stand up for us!

Maintaining Net Neutrality is fundamental to the success of creatives and entrepreneurs. Allowing ISPs to limit content access to the highest bidders will be a crippling blow to innovation.
—Andrew Bowers, ,

I am 78 years old and as a person living on a fixed income, net neutrality is very important to me. I believe that the First Amendment and Title II include the principle that all of us should have equal access to information. Thus, I believe that Internet service providers (ISPs) must treat all data equally. The FCC should use its Title II authority to protect the internet. Without net neutrality, the U.S. will be losing a great equalizer in a democracy where equality is absent in so many aspects of our society. Please do not allow ISPs to manipulate our Internet experience by speeding up some services and slowing down others. Fairness in our society is generally lacking. Please do not compound this by giving businesses with formidable assets to have an advantage over smaller businesses. Fairness, an equal playing field and other such principles have been one of the great advantages of the internet. Please do not toss away this great equalizer.
—James G. Mellen, Salinas, CA

Net neutrality ensures a wide spread of onformaion and the general bettering of the human race. Though it is a forum for cat pictures and memes, it also provides information on the sciences and arts that allow man to grow. Take this away from the common man and the benefit of this system becomes guided by those with their own best interests in mind, destroying one of the few level playing fields available for open forum and discussion.
—Joshua Rempel, ,

I'm appalled that this is even in question. Net Neutrality is absolutely essential if freedom and equality are to remain fundamental values of this country. It is extremely clear what we, the people, want; stop the nonsense and give us Net Neutrality.

It is the freedom of speech that was a cornerstone of the fight against tyranny in the second world war, this erodes that significantly and casts shame on those that succumb to money and power over freedom and what is right-if you allow this then can you look yourself in the mirror and feel you did THE RIGHT AND HONEST THING?

Having four large telecoms throttle the internet for millions, and businesses is dangerous and may prove to be a lethal blow to an already weak economy. Consider a group fund that large enterprises such as Google, Netflix, Amazon and others could contribute to in aiding infrastructure development.

—Tristan Poirier, ,

The internet is one of the few places where free, uninhibited widespread communication is possible. It's an enormous source of information and has become an integral part of society today. Taking away net neutrality would be equivalent to the many occasions in history where books were restricted and destroyed to keep the public dumb.

—Greg Calardo, Cincinnati, OH

Without net neutrality, my favorite and independent websites, as well as their services will suffer, and so will the web. I will no longer be able to reliably listen to local, public radio, and classical stations over the internet as I do now. My church, and other churches across America will not have the funds to keep their traffic from being throttled, and my independent, informational blogs, and privately operated websites I subscribe to will cease to deliver reliable, quickly accessible content. Please don't let this happen! Hear our voice as consumers. Thank you, Tony.

—Tony Ruxton, Redmond, OR

Being disabled I use the internet as my window to the world. Shopping, entertainment, social media are my lifelines to thrive with such limitations.

—Stephen King, ,

I am going to avoid pleading for simple justice, decency, equal access, educational benefits and not further rewarding large corporate telecoms for horrific customer service/product values for the exorbitant prices they charge. Instead, I will emphasize the utter capitalistic counter-intuitiveness of allowing large telecoms to completely monopolize the internet. Further corporatizing Net Neutrality will limit the amount and range of data that the Government and corporations will be able to collect from users, analyze and then sell repeatedly. This in turn will impact directly the continued growth of the free market and inhibit the development of new products and services. Large telecoms already receive great regulatory and financial advantages. If they are too lazy to continue to compete in a market which is already heavily structured to their advantage, then I believe, by their own philosophy, they should be eliminated and allow those who can and want to take over. Thank you.

—A M Hricko, San Francisco, CA

Freedom is one of the most important things in our lives and in our society. Without this we will lose yet another piece of freedom, all so that a few people will make a bigger chunk of change. Net neutrality is the worst idea that has ever been suggested in the history of the internet. If so many people are against this, why are you doing it? Because you like being seen as "evil"? I mean think about it, this is the opposite of what freedom is, might as well live in China or North Korea..

—Taylor Allard, ,

A free and open internet is to today's society what the free Franklin Library was to Philadelphia in the 18th C. If the ISPs are finding it too burdensome to upgrade the network, I sympathize completely. No business should be forced to be burdened with costs they do not wish to accrue. However, we the people, as the principle investors and driving force behind the development of the internet, should not be in turn inflicted with the anti-competition and monopolistic intent of the major ISPs to remove Smith's invisible hand from the internet in lieu of true capitalistic development. The internet is merely the conduit, if the ISPs cannot make a profit then let them out and, for their own good and the good of the public, do what needed to be done in the late 1990's and turn the internet into a public utility. It's obviously in the best interest of these ISPs, for they cannot imagine making a profit without bringing the consumer back to the AOL model of 1994. The deal made between the public and the ISPs was we the consumer would pay a reasonable flat rate for access, maintenance and upgrades to the fiber and the ISPs would provide the fiber and leave the content alone. If they cannot uphold their end of the bargain, we should let them off the hook and develop the network as a public utility. A free and open internet stimulates competition between ISPs. A closed monopolistic system like cable TV does not. And the free and open internet model prevents unfair pricing as in the cable TV industry. As we saw with the recent complaints of the cable TV providers about unfair competition by internet companies in distributing and offering content, a free and open internet promotes innovation and stimulates technological progression. People use it to promote ideas and connect to like minded individuals easily, as we've seen in the Arab Spring in Egypt and corporate control the internet would lead to a more Great Firewall of China or Iran scenario than the First Amendment. Unless, of course, you are a corporation. A free and open internet also promotes and drives entrepreneurship, and isn't that the business of America? Promoting new business instead of preserving the buggy whip industry? I think, once again, Smith's invisible hand of the market must be given free rein and not by promoting a series of regional corporate monopolies as demonstrated by the poor customer service by the cable industry. So Mr. Tom Wheeler, keep the internet open and free. Keep net neutrality and reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II as should have been done in the late 1990's. Do not give into your lobbying past, do what is best for the American people and society. Keep net neutrality and tell the ISPs to find a viable business model that won't crush an open society. Thank you for your time.

—Marcus Sellers, Spruce Creek, PA

The power to freely express myself and learn uninhabited is to pure to let a "elite few" control. We have to fight for freedom in our lives, let this be the first step.

—Michael Fisher, Kennesaw, GA

what is left but the net for freedom of speech ? why do you want to take that away ? has big money got to you to ? this is just not right ! you do know what the right thing to do is, just tell big money to take a hike.

—Bill moore, Philipsburg, PA

I just started a business and am worried about customers finding my website if corporate sites are given preference. I am trying my best to keep myself off social assistance and net neutrality is the last thing I need in my way.

—Brandon Milk, ,

Fast lanes being paid for will influence productivity at work and at home. Not only will you lose time that you could be spending doing work by waiting in the slow lane due to it not being for, but you will essentially be killing off indie/start-up companies' traffic flow with slow lanes. Only big companies benefit from this and none of the smaller companies will who can't afford paying for the fast lane. Fast lanes and slow lanes effect everyone in the US not just a small group of people. Quality life will be impacted depending on which company can afford the fast lane payment.

—Adam, Braintree, MA

We should be able to access whatever we want, when we want, and how fast we want to access it.

—Dakota Lyman, Sanford, FL

No ONE organization owns the Internet NOR should ANYONE have the right to BUY it! It is not something that can be restricted or made to restrict anyone from accessing any particular website, or forum. The Internet is a FREE PLACE TO ENACT YOUR RIGHTS TO FREE SPEECH, TO EXCHANGE THOUGHTS, TO LEARN AND TO BE ENTERTAINED. ISP's ONLY duty is allow access to the Internet, NOT to restrict you to only those who pay them money to be on their list of accessible sites, or to charge more money to allow any individual the opportunity to view "premium" sites like CABLE/SATELLITE providers. ISP'S DO NOT OWN THE CONTENT OF THE INTERNET. THE PEOPLE OF THE WORLD DO. ISP'S PROVIDE ONLY THE DOORWAY TO THE WORLD WIDE WEB, NOT WHAT IS BEHIND THAT DOOR. SHAME ON ALL THOSE WHO THINK GREED CAN FORCE THE HUMAN POPULATION TO BEND TO THE WILL OF THE WEALTHY. SHAME ON YOU FOR ALLOWING EVEN THE POSSIBILITY OF STRANGULATION OF FREE WILL AND FREE THOUGHT. BY ALLOWING THIS TO COME TO FRUITION, YOU ARE MURDERING THE EXPANSION OF THE MIND AND KILLING THE VERY ESSENCE OF WHY THE INTERNET WAS CREATED IN THE FIRST PLACE!!! Yes, some content is disturbing. Yes, some content is questionable. Yes, some content is downright disgusting. But that is the choice of the people... to be ALLOWED the choice to view/take part in voicing opinions or not. What you are planning to do is JUST PLAIN DISGRACEFUL. SHAME ON YOU. SHAME ON YOUR CONSCIENCE FOR TAKING THE SIDE OF GREED OVER THE SIDE OF JUSTICE. I HOPE YOU WILL NOT LET THIS PASS. IF IT DOES, I HOPE YOU CHOKE ON THE FIRST DOLLAR YOU RAPE FROM THE WORLD.

—J Robinson, ,

Attention Mr. Tom Wheeler, FCC Chairman: Re: Public Comments on Net Neutrality The Internet is important to me, because as a senior who has limited transportation and means, it allows me to interact with others, conduct personal business, and troubleshoot; it's my lifeline. The internet is also my medium for researching a number of issues, publishing commentaries, and political activism, especially dissent. I need to know that there will not be barriers to entry for the new ideas and services that I or others (aspiring college grads for example) may want to bring to the marketplace or for the betterment of our world. If ISP subscribers have an easier time loading websites of existing companies than my new innovative product or ideas I may want to present, there's no way that I will be able to compete or succeed in those issues and things important to me and others I network with. However, despite all of the above I am deeply concerned that, You, Mr. Wheeler, having once been a huge powerbroker/ lobbyist for the very industry you are supposedly now a watchdog for seriously bothers me. It's said the Koch Brothers refer to ordinary hardworking people as "useful idiots." I'm beginning to realize the folks with power in this nation take a lot of ordinary, decent people to be fools, these days. It is truly sad to witness the insanity committed in our name, with our tax dollars, and always without our consent. I also believe President Obama appointed You, Mr. Wheeler, to the FCC as a matter of repayment for the cooperation that was extended by telecom giants in assisting the NSA with the retrieval of everyone's meta-data in this country and well beyond, a case of I'll pat your back and later you pat mine. Or worse, consider the recent case of the Bahamas, where the NSA has captured everyone's cell phone communications and content in that Island Nation. While these are my foremost concerns, along with millions of other Americans, I doubt Mr. Wheeler (and those You are still lobbying for) that You really give a damn about what us "useful idiots" truly feel or think. Given the FCC's revolving door tradition, which is especially prevalent between government and industry these days, and noticeably evident in the career paths of FCC's most recent chairmen, creates even more alarm. These mega monstrosities, like Comcast, want the internet to look like today's cable television. You are forced into packages full of junk content, with overpriced tolls for every little item, even for old cinema, which has catapulted fees out into the stratosphere and has sent service straight into the toilet. "We the People" have made the internet what it is today through market forces. What also evolved was a communications system that brings us the ability to stand up for democracy, especially in one of America's darkest periods. As one internet user or "useful idiot" put it a few years ago, "...The internet brings us the ability to send each other pictures, socialize and not to mention that it's the greatest tool for activism this planet has ever seen." It is this latter point that I believe concerns You, Mr. Wheeler, and those of your mindset the most. That's what makes us "useful idiots" a force to be reckoned with, especially when we are all finally on the same page. It is real simple Mr. Wheeler; use the public utility option. Just declare the net a common carrier, which is what it is. If you were about fairness, the latter would already be a reality. Lara DeLuz

—Lara DeLuz, Orangevale, CA

I want to experience the internet as it is, not as people can afford to make it.

—Liam Johnstone, ,

I work from home and rely on the internet for many aspects of my life. As an American citizen I feel the internet is like Ben Franklin's invention of the public library. Just as it is clear commercial interests should never have control of access to the contents of a public library, it is equally true that internet providers should not be able to bias or deny access to users or content providers. Legal oversight should be in the public domain.

—Deborah Short, La Canada, CA

The internet is the last bastion of free speech and equality in the world. It is also the last corner of the world that still allows small businesses to compete on a level playing field with even the largest of corporations. It allows for incomparable levels of access to information, communication and up to the moment innovation world wide. It cannot be taken over, controlled and exploited by corporations. This may seem overly dramatic to some, but I truly believe it is the key to the next level of human evolution. The evolution of thought, global empathy, innovation, egalitarianism and a complete revolution in the way all things are done. It is morally impermissible for those with the power to act in protection of this gift to the world, to allow the greedy and powerful to corrupt it.

—Eric Rose, ,

Just like the war fought by Martin Luther against the Catholic Church the free press and an open internet are paramount to our freedoms as US citizens. Any stifling of the ideas and opinions of anyone for, or against, the powers that be will be a terrible mistake and will forever reshape the world in a nightmarish fashion.

—Charles Van Natta, Valley Springs, CA

This is the one thing in our lives which must not be commodified. Please make the right call and leave the Internet equally accesible to everyone.

The most important thing about the American internet use is that the "little people" (average American income) have uninterrupted access to the internet at an equivalent speed to ANYONE else. No fast lanes because we live in a democracy and we need to ensure equal opportunity for all Americans to receive and send information at the same speed so that NO ONE has an information advantage over another person for any reason!!!!!! Please use Title II to accomplish this balanced dispersal of information to Americans----Thank you, FCC!!!!

Telecommunication is being controlled by a very few players already. They create monopolies that have been increasingly becoming out of reach of an average person. With further restrictions planed by the big tecoms, more and more people will be unable to access a reliable and quick internet service. In today's world, in which all of us are increasingly dependent on internet for most of our daily needs such as shopping, banking, education, communication, entertainment etc, this means a vast majority of us will become disenfranchised.

—Leon Stephens, ,

Without net neutrality in the USA, server networks in China or Russia may become the primary hosts for alternative ISPs who will respect user's desire for fast service on all platforms. This shift could result in the reduction of profits for American corporations, and increase the variety and quantity of malware/viruses entering the North American corporate infrastructure as individuals use laptops between private and corporate locations. It will also reduce the amount of information gathering achievable by the NSA of non-American citizens as new server hubs are established outside of the realm of Big Telecom corporations operating in the USA.

Giving the wealthiest corporations and individuals one more advantage in their competition against smaller folks would help cement the monopolistic control they've been gaining on our economic playing field, and would make it harder and harder for small innovators to survive.

The internet is important in just about every aspect of our lives today, whether it be from ordering a product, starting a business, or even simply sharing an image. In turn, the internet is arguably the most important method of communication ever invented to date; it quite literally does everything that all other previous mediums have done on a grander scale due to its inter-connectivity. The result is arguably a golden era of communication and spread of culture. If this were to in any way be hindered through any form of higher regulation that what already exists, then this interconnected web of different ideas and backgrounds would not be nurtured but instead taken away and put down. If we want a more peaceful and effectively operated world, then what is necessary is a greater awareness of other cultures and their ideas so that what is foreign is at least somewhat familiar in our own minds: you cannot work with what you do not understand. This will be hindered the sooner we lead the structure of the present neutral internet astray. If we want a more successful and capable world, then what is needed is the framework of the internet to be left stable and dependable, yet free and open for improvement. With companies such as Facebook, Twitter, Tumblr, Google, Spotify, Netflix, Dropbox, Etsy, Kickstarter etc. sprouting up and becoming tremendously successful in such short notice, it is quite apparent in just how useful economically the current state of affairs the internet is in its structure. Without a neutral net, things like this would likely be more difficult to build up with different segmented populations or things such as pay walls blocking varying areas of the internet, directly affecting the potential capability of growth of this potentially limitless resource. Education would also be a resource hurt from similar reasons as business would in a non-neutral net; it would not be surprising if interest groups from companies that operate under pay walls would make deals with certain companies to make it easier to use certain sources than others, and likely sites like Khan Academy or Wikipedia would be smothered out in the United States, or potentially in total considering that these websites operate under donations from its users, whom may be cut off due to a non-neutral net. The implications of a non-neutral net are really quite staggering, and all in all does not seem to be that much of an improvement on the current structure present for the internet. If anything, doing so would likely only benefit interest groups that are technologically behind and are afraid of their industry shrinking due to the fact that the internet is a direct competitor in many senses, despite the fact that they could quite easily use the internet as a place to expand into. So I ask of you as your constituent to keep the internet neutral, and do us all a favor.

The internet is a very powerful democratization force that we shall not allow to be compromised by greedy corporations and corrupt politicians.

—Bruce Hermon, ,

It is the economic lifeblood of our country and our creativity!!!

—Ann Crosby, Leavenworth, WA

I am a software engineer. The kind of insanity that these corporations want to implement will have deeply negative consequences on many industries, our public infrastructure and ultimately on our economy, while being borderline illegal. ISPs are already getting paid on both ends (consumers / content providers) for the services they provide and, their greed notwithstanding, they are providing what amounts nowadays to a public utility. So many businesses depend on the free flow of information, and have been able to compete thanks to it. To allow ISPs to charge premiums would be to allow them to create a cartel and enforce monopolies more or less as they wish. This is a major conflict of interest, and I will not stand for allowing them to break their end of the contract without serious legal consequences. I am already paying quite a lot of money (especially when compared to, say, European countries) to get access to bandwidth, free from their schemes and opinions on how I should use it, and that is what I intend to get in exchange for it.

Net neutrality is the last straw in the big corporate takeover. If that goes, serious revolt will happen by the people. I am sick of corporations limiting my voice for the bottom dollar. I want access to information and if you take away my right to access or limit the information I can research there no real point in continuing this shame we call America. I don't wanna live in a dictatorship, I'm sure no one else does either. Common Carrier sounds like the way to go to help keep the voice of the people heard.

—Eric Lillieberg, Flint, MI

Hands off the internet. You are nothing but self- elected corporate goons who think can dictate to free humans of the world what we can or cannot do. I can see class action in the international human rights court becoming reality. This will become personal, real people behind this dastardly move will be sued.

—Chris of Masters, ,

The interenet is not something you can control, no more than you can control what people can say. Net Neutrality is vital for keeping our basic rights intact.

—Ian Polito, Lawrenceburg, IN

A free internet is as necessary in a democracy as is free speech. Allowing wealthier entities to buy faster speeds gives their opinions unfair advantage.

1st Amendment

—Colin Ryan, Elgin, IL

net neutrality evens the playing field for everyone and protects all sorts of freedoms like speech and innovation. also net neutrality is easily maintained whereas allowing net neutrality to degrade will create a legislative morass as a new class of underprivileged will be created and require protection.

—David Anema, ,

We need net neutrality to preserve our right to freedom of speech and expression. The internet can be an odd place at times but full of ideas, experiences and knowledge, all of which will be threatened if net neutrality is lost. The sharing of ideas and thoughts will become limited neutral internet, one of our foremost tools in this day and age, we will become a society where we no longer have the ability to freely express ourselves. The ISP's will become of the gatekeepers, determining what we may see and when and outright blocking ideas, thoughts or knowledge that the do no agree with. We can still call it a democracy, but it's the first steps to dictatorship.

The internet is vital to the productivity and enrichment of US citizens, and it is imperative that the US government protect this vital resource in the same manner that it protects other vital resources at the same mandate level as our air and fresh water sources, our public educational services and our national public libraries. Internet access is now a basic right for modern life and tipping the balance towards greater control by private enterprise will stifle the growth and the development of a more stable and equitable culture.

The Internet is the last vestige of free speech and needs to be accessible to all people, regardless of the content or content provider.

—Jean Roberts, Chicago, IL

It's ridiculous to interfere with internet communications, and it's more ridiculous still to allow any group to have any say in what is available, where it is available and who should have priority access to it assuming the content isn't illegal. The internet is an open community, where free speech and freedom to information grows. Anything can be found online and that's the way it's meant to be. By allowing anyone to implement charges or fines to sectors of the internet we are taking a giant leap towards censorship of content, which in all reality is exactly where this mess is headed. There may be sites online that are distasteful, or even immoral. It's the owners right to put that information online, and it's up to the end user to determine whether they'll visit such a site. The very thought of regulating what is online, or charging an access fee or any other type of fee is to take away the equality that is the internet from those who can't afford it, and ultimately end up negatively affecting the internet as a whole. This is in the same realm as the TPP, and on that topic, I propose the following. When is it that drug dealers (or producers) are punished? After they have been caught of course. And how are they caught? Maybe they are caught in the act, or maybe there is suspicion to justify surveillance or even a search of their property, but would such a search ever be permitted before there was suspicion? Absolutely not. It's unfortunate that there isn't a way to out those who are breaking the law in the process without violating their privacy, but that is the reality of the world we live in. Don't focus on removing privacy, focus on finding better ways to catch law breakers causing actual problems. I present the following example. If there is someone selling drugs online, or arranging to sell drugs online, then there may be no way of knowing it's going on until they are caught. It's the same as if someone was distributing drugs from their home. You would never know until they (or someone they associate with) has been caught, and once they are caught there is a valid reason for suspicion of a crime and further investigation. From there trace their internet activity based on the fact that they have been implicated. It may be less effective, but it is far less immoral to target individuals known or suspected to be involved in criminal activity rather than to blanket

—Scott Cameron, Sterling Heights, MI

Net Neutrality is important because it doesn't favor big business or small business. It allows for a level playing field, free of unnecessary and harmful intervention that could prove to hurt the overall structure and effectiveness of the internet. Net neutrality keeps things simple. It should be reclassified under Title II so it can become official. It's time to act.

Just keep it the way it is

—Tom Pius, ,

Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. We urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality. Best Regards

—Simon Matters, ,

Net neutrality is the reason why we have so many diverse services available for free, with or without advertising. Imagine what the net would be like if we lost access to sites such as wikipedia because they could not afford to pay for sufficient priority to be usable on the system. Once tiered pricing becomes the accepted norm, it won't be long before any broadband source site would become practically unusable if they can't afford to pay for priority access. Please, oh PLEASE protect the internet for us.

It doesn't make any sense that data providers be charged to supply information. They're already paying for their connection, as are we. If they have to pay for an internet fast-lane, eventually I feel that that's a step short of making us pay for premiere access to certain internet sites or communities.

—Erin Strunk, Norman, OK

Like millions of Americans, the internet is integral to the way I live: I need it constantly to take classes, get medical advice, work with my neighbors to guard and watch over our neighborhood against crime and for safety; keep contact frequently with my faraway family, and do most of my shopping. All this would be lost and my life would be much more difficult and lonely and even scarier if the FCC would permit the internet to become another highway to profits for wealthy corporations versus serving the needs of millions of average Americans! Freedom to information and online services is a common good like access to water, heating, lighting and healthcare. Society will not function healthily without it. An uneven internet would disadvantage those already disadvantaged and increase inequality, harming us all in the long term.

—Alex Dickinson, ,

I advise that we should support Net Neutrality due to its positive outcomes for our civil society. Removing it creates inefficiency by artificially degrading transfer speeds and limits knowledge attainable by users due as a result of data filtering. It gives telecom giants more control and power by lowering transfer speeds, increasing costs, and creating an artificial scarcity of knowledge/competition. Additionally this move goes against our rights to privacy since telecom giants would use deep packet inspection in order to determine throttling and filtration.

—E Tamasdan, ,

I personally require that the Net Neutrality continues for the protection of all users.

—Tanzella Gaither, Columbia, SC

The free word, spoken written or typed, creation, artistic freedom and the ability to freely roam the ark of knowledge our race has created for itself is a sacred privilege we have granted ourselves. It should not be tainted in such a way as to bend to the wills of the financially minded, that we might work towards a future that such whims are un-needed. I beg of all those that look upon these words; do not let us into the dark, let us stay true to our own choices, that we might stride forward into informational freedom, finally, and co-exist peacefully.

—David William Charles Bryant, ,

We have rights and freedoms in this country, we already pay for internet service, it is not fair right or just to allow the largest corporation to run it and charge a huge fee for a fast lane making it almost impossible for certain people to even get into the fast lane.

Freedom of Speech is a Constitutionally protected item. If you must, simply mandate adult content warnings, such as the Parental Advisory stickers on CDs, then call it a day. I would hate to think of the Internet forcing me to take down an image of the crucified Christ, because some people might find it gruesome, insensitive, containing too much "nudity". Leave the policing to the parents.

Special interests in my state, Utah, are currently trying to kill one of our newspapers---the one the right wing interests wish didn't exist---the one with the biggest subscription list--- the one the internet alerted those of us who care was in danger. We're fighting it. In the meantime, win lose or draw on this one, the internet is the world's free press. The special interests who now want muzzle this one are the very people I consider the most dangerous to my personal rights and freedoms. They are robber barons who want to buy my voice. —Miriam Bérubé, ,

This is part of why the internet matters.

—Juliet deButts, New York, NY

The US has had its internet service split up into a sort of joint monopoly between several providers that care more about lining their own pockets than doing the best job they can for their customers. Without steps being taken to keep them honest, they will do everything they can to ensure people pay more for less, which includes using underhanded tactics to prevent any sort of competition from arising. If allowed to bypass net neutrality, ultimately, this will result in them bullying third parties into paying them unnecessary and excessive fees, as well as stomping out any competition that would operate in a more honest manner. As an agency of the US government meant to oversee all manner of communications, internet included, it is your job to see that those providing said communications operate in an honest manner. Be it as the first or last line of defense, the FCC should always act in the greater interest of the people, not privately owned corporations with more than enough money and power already at their disposal.

I have been an Internet user, producer, consumer, innovator, and educator since early days of the World Wide Web. Open access and a level playing field have been key elements that have shaped the Internet and users during this fledging period of digital history. During my teaching career, the students, who I have had the privilege to work with, have far surpassed my online experiences. However, a common vision we shared, was of an Internet equality and openness that is best quantified as being a common carrier. Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

—Ian Gustafson, Colorado Springs, CO

If we lose net neutrality we will most certainly fall victim to corporate greed interfering with the free market. It will play highway man, and eventual executioner to every entrepreneur, small/family business, publicly funded research and development firms and grass roots charities that rely heavily on the internet to conduct there business and share information for the betterment of the american people. It sets the stage for a monopoly, and I will not have it!

Give US Our Freedoms back Dear Federal Communications Commission: We stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: 1.Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. 2.Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. 3.Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. 4.Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. As a law librarian working in a public law library I see hundreds of ordinary people who cannot afford legal representation coming to the law library to do legal research because they are unable to afford inexpensive internet access that would allow them to access their own state, county & municipal laws in their own homes. It is time for the United States of America to follow the example of Brazil and pass an equivalent to the Civil Law Marco Internet/Internet Bill of Rights. The USA needs to encourage freedom and net neutrality, not controlled content and fascism. Despite the regression that has occurred in this nation for the past 34 years, and especially during the past 13, many Americans have not forgotten when we were citizens, not just "consumers." We know our nation's history, and our family history as it relates to American history. We believe in living free or dying. We refuse to become neo-feudalism's passive slaves.

—Roberta Beach, St. Paul, MN

The Internet is supposed to be for access by everybody. I object to people who already have more than they need attempting to take it over for their own personal benefit.

—Barnard Ward, ,

Net Neutrality is in the public interest, and the internet is by definition meant for sharing information, not restricting it.

—Dave West, ,

Equal access to the pipes by all will spur innovation and expansion of web content - this in turn will encourage ISP's to expand and speed up their networks. In the end we will have a robust and stable internet market place. Monopoly control of the service does none of these things; and in fact, it does the reverse. I know Congress is broken and no longer represents the people but only the corporations - but for the Commission at least, stand up on your hind legs and be taken into account. Go down in flames if necessary - but go down fighting. for Common Carrier status for all ISP's and a future roll for the FCC in governance. Our Children's Children will still be thanking you in their time. Michael Holloway Toronto, Canada

Don't make good Internet content for wealthy people only, please. This is one place where, with access, we all have equality.

—Linda K. Miles, Kent, OH

The internet is an integral part of how society and business now function. Access to information in a timely fashion is imperative. "Pay for premium" access to the internet will put an undue burden and create delays for independent users, students and businesses and will create a negative impact on our economy due to slowed production for those who cannot afford the "upgrade".

—K Rivard, Sterling Heights, MI

The internet is like air - one of the few things that ordinary folk can still enjoy because it's not (yet) totally owned or controlled by big gov or big biz for their own (often dark) purposes. The destruction of Net Neutrality will directly affect me. I am a freelance editor and am beginning a business partnership with a fellow editor—in which we'll need a website to direct prospective clients to. Since we are two freelance editors living hand-to-mouth—and not a huge corporate entity—our website will get pushed into the "slow" lane, which will have a direct and extremely negative effect on our ability to draw clients to our small business. Please save Net Neutrality and all the small businesses they support—as these small business represent the middle class of America.

I work in education on the South Side of Chicago. I spend my days trying to inspire young people to go to college, and use the internet to connect them to essential resources, projects, places, and ideas far beyond their neighborhood. I motivate them by promising them that their voice matters, and that they can use it to make the world a better place. Every voice matters. And, in a democracy, we supposedly believe that every voice matters EQUALLY—regardless of whether that perspective is that of an underserved teen or that of a corporate lawyer, whether that perspective is shared in person or on the internet. When you allow wealthy companies and individuals to share their voices in ways that are both faster and more expensive than those available to everyone else, you effectively allow their voices to matter more. That undermines the fundamental democratic principles on which our country and history is based, and erodes the progress toward social justice that so many educators and others have been working for our whole lives. Please preserve net neutrality and, with it, freedom of speech and the promise of equality. Thank you in advance for doing the right thing.

—Marya Spont-Lemus, Chicago, IL

Net Neutrality is important to me because: 1) My livelihood comes from the free & open internet 2) I live in Silicon Valley, and so much of our innovation comes from the free & open internet. I love living in a place where a single person can start a successful internet business just the same as a large corporation, and the culture of innovation this foments. This keeps the United States competitive with the rest of the world. 3) I am part of a number of vibrant internet-based communities which would not be possible without Net Neutrality. 4) I use the internet to keep in touch with friends & family all over the United States and the world. Net Neutrality protects this ability, strengthening families & communities.

—J Simon Cornette, Santa Clara, CA

The Internet needs to be uninhibited so that every individual can use it to its full extent, not just those who can afford to pay for the full experience. The Internet is the last place one can go for unbiased, non-paid for news. It is the last real outlet for the people. Everyone should be allowed to benefit from it equally. Don't let this become another part of the corporate America, the bought and paid for, the unequal rights that we are so ashamed to be.

—Zachary Mcatee, Lawson, MO

We need a non-tiered and to promote innovation and to retain economic advantage. Creating a "premium" Internet where some people are worse off than others goes against the very philosophy that the World Wide Web was founded on when Tim Berners-Lee created it so many years ago. I strongly urge you to retain the essential foundations of Net Neutrality.

—Gabriel Mansour, ,

Net Neutrality is basically the foundation of the Internet as we know it. It's a service that remains a fair and opportune battleground for companies both big and small. Eliminating Net Neutrality is the equivalent of allowing big companies to forcibly run the little man out of business in the strive for a larger profit. This is illegal now, and we know it's because it's just plain fair. Eliminating Net Neutrality is almost like ASKING companies to compete to become monopolies while effectively running all of the newcomers out of business. Not only is it unfair, but it eliminates many product choices (the basis for capitalism!), decreases overall affordability for the consumer, and it will severely decrease the quality and service of the Internet. This is, in no way, the "American Way." This is not Democratic.

—Daniel James Dubetsky, Sanborn, NY

A free and open internet is exactly why the internet is so great. It is abhorrent to turn the internet itself into a marketplace at the expense of all internet users, limiting access and pushing down content that is undesirable to companies. For the sake of equality, knowledge, education and innovation, net neutrality is of utmost importance!

—Annan Shehadi, Hickory Hills, IL

Freedom of information. Access to it at an affordable price. Fast speeds for poor Americans, not just wealthy Americans.

—Walt Raugh, Southgate, MI

"Even if you are not keen on watching me masturbate online, it does not give you the means to discriminate those who do enjoy watching. —Tony Kunnari, ,

We all have the right to free and equal access to the internet--everyone, regardless of economic class. We all have the right to choose what information we access. —Ingrid Thornton, ,

The Internet should be free and clear of restriction for everyone

—Janet Ostrowski, Waukegan, IL

Taking out net neutrality is the same as molesting an innocent living being, as it not only isn't constitutional at all, but as well as a violation against human's right, progress and innovation. I refuse to be lead by people scared about what we think by censoring everything we hold dear as it would rape the democracy altogether. Citizens pay taxes, devote hard work to ensure the country's economy and how do you thank them back, by removing their fair use of the internet? This isn't how democracy should work, people deserved to be listened and not being treated into a dictatorship.

—Cedrick Monette, ,

Net Neutrality is needed to insure that small start up companies, personal sites, non-profits, and all others who cannot afford to pay for better service can still be competitive in new and emerging markets. It also will help to lower costs of doing business online for both customers and corporations. The only ones that benefit from steep tolls for premium access and blocking or slowing down websites and services that can't afford the new fees are Big Telcom who is actually overcharging for service as it is. From working in the field I know that the profit margins for bandwidth are already extremely high. Think well over 1000% higher than the actual cost of supplying the bandwidth.

Freedom of the press once applied to anything printed on paper - now it applies to anything transmitted on the Internet. Under the FCC current proposal, no longer would Net users sift and winnow ideas based on their merits, but rather on the deep pockets of their sponsors. Also, it would make telecommunication companies use the turnpike model - charge wealthy users for premium service, and let the other users compete for the side roads that are still barely passable. There would be no incentive to expand the pipes to handle additional traffic.

The internet is not a utility. It is public property and must be retained as such. Sell it off to the highest bidder, and everyone will lose out because it will no longer be a public source of information. —Hugh, ,

Your proposal is very flawed. Net Neutrality is important to help with innovation, and investment in network backbone. Your proposal will see one groups content, or websites is favored over another. For example here in Canada, the big telecoms like Shaw, Rogers, Bell, are also content providers and could in fact "shape" traffic to favor the content from sites they are associated with, like television stations CTV, Global, CityTV, while an independent television station like CHCH could have their content stuck in the lower tier unless they paid a premium. This was seen when Bell, had done that to CBC when people could not access a video stream from CBC several years ago, and now you want to give someone free rain to do it again. It amounts to Las Vegas in the mob controlled hay day, where you could get a better table if you slipped the guy at the door a $20. Is this the kind of mentality that you want to impart on the internet Mr. Chairman? Is this fair? NO.... the internet was created back in the day as a way to FREELY EXCHANGE IDEAS WITH NO ONES CONTENT BEING FAVORED. Now with your skewed sense of what Net Neutrality is you want to basically screw the little guy entrepreneur, who sets up a website to sell his product or service as he can not afford to have a retail location. You want to kill innovation, entrepreneurial spirit, and put in place a system which will ultimately show favoritism to one sites content over another. I fully support the Free Press' proposed Net Neutrality, where the Internet Service Providers are to be classified as a "common carrier". They should only be a backbone to transport internet traffic like when the internet was created, and not be allowed to influence who gets the better service. If you force through what the big telecom lobbyists want you will have effectively killed, innovation, entrepreneurship and the internet in North America, with the stroke of a pen. You MUST put through the Free Press' proposal instead of your own.

—Dean Schlueter, ,

Net neutrality has been the underlying principle of the internet since its inception. It's the idea that all websites and internet services should be treated equally, no matter if they are owned by Rupert Murdoch, the Koch brothers or a single grassroots activist in Wisconsin. Because of net neutrality, Internet Service Providers (ISPs), like Comcast, Verizon, and other Big Telcos can't force people to pay them in order for their websites to load. The Big Telcos want to change that, and start forcing people to pay them in order for their websites to load. While this will be fine with big corporations like Fox News, it will crush My ability to afford a good connection. Net neutrality is the First Amendment of the Internet, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data equally. As an Internet user, net neutrality is vitally important to me. The FCC should use its Title II authority to protect it. Most Americans have only one choice for truly high speed Internet: their local cable company. This is a political failure, and it is an embarrassment. America deserves competition and choice. Without net neutrality, a bad situation gets even worse. These ISPs will now be able to manipulate our Internet experience by speeding up some services and slowing down others. That kills choice, diversity, and quality. It also causes tremendous economic harm. If ISPs can speed up favored services and slow others, new businesses will no longer be able to rely on a level playing field. When ISPs can slow your site and destroy your business at will, how can any startup attract investors? My friends, family, and I use the Internet for conversation and fun, but also for work and business. When you let ISPs mess with our Internet experience, you are attacking our social lives, our entertainment, and our economic well being. We won't stand for it. ISPs are opposing Title II so that they can destroy the FCC's net neutrality rules in court. This is the same trick they pulled last time. Please, let's not be fooled again. Title II is the strong, legally sound way to enforce net neutrality. Use it.

We have gradually been forced to use the internet due to its' speed and lower costs of services for businesses,banks and governments.A two tiered or multi-tiered system for access to better quality bandwidth will have a significant impact on net neutrality and will provide significant advantage for those users who can afford to pay a premium price for it.The internet is too much a part of everyday life to allow for this type of distortion between users.

The web was created with an idea that it was to be totally free unfortunately that was never to be totally true as we the public had to rely on companies to provide the service that most of us could not afford but now some of those same companies want to put individual homes and people into a second class service but making the faster service to expensive for us to use this is unfair and just another way for those with money to make more money there can be no other reason for this push big companies can already use the faster service the same as the rest of us.

Corporate mass-media is completely controlled by the powers of the western banking elite. The only place where we currently have an open and free exchange of information is the Internet. Taking away net neutrality is another step in the wrong direction in a desperate attempt of the global elite to take control of the Internet. Currently, the Internet is already under great threat and censorship is actively happening to stop the spreading of ideas that can free humanity. However, the ghost is out of the bottle and there is no turning back from this! We are awake and more people are waking up every day. There is no way that the banking elite can stop the evolution of society and humanity, as any attempt in doing this will awaken more people to the reality of this false control system. The people responsible for pushing the agenda of this global elite are increasingly being exposed due to the transparency of the Internet. It is time for the people working for the agenda of the Western banking elite to realize that this evolution cannot be stopped, and that their involvement in this global scheme will not be forgotten. To Tom Wheeler and his companions that are pushing this legislation I want to say the following: Now is the time to stand behind the will of the people and use your power to do good for this world. Whatever will be your deciding role in this, the people will not forget. Keep the Internet free!

I believe it is an unfair advantage for big companies to set the guidelines that will promote their successes. There are very smart people who come up with these proposed changes and behind the curtain they can easily plan their own ways to benefit from their proposals beyond what others are able to accomplish. Too much change in such a short period of time is uncalled for and is far too suspicious to simply allow. Please don't go ahead and change something so dramatically where it doesn't need fixing. The internet is just now becoming extremely useful and open for everyone to grow, enjoy and use without the need to hand over our hard earn money just to be able to access and to use at our free will.

—Anthony, ,

The internet is a place of freedom and expression of opinion, without neutrality this cannot be fully achieved.

Losing net neutrality would hamper scientific innovation at academic institutions using the internet to share data and collaborate on research. You'd either be slowing the pace of research (with its increasing data volumes) or passing a greater part of government grant money directly to broadband providers, rather than having it used directly for research. Common carriage is arguably a nationwide grant to all academic research.

—Peter MacMurchy, ,

Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like.

Killing the Net Neutrality would bring a lot of hurt for everyone who uses the internet, the big teleco companies would use that to bring in the "Subscription only" methods to milk out more money from the common human being, just like pay TV services. That's not on.

Net Neutrality is the last semi-even playing field in the world for everyday citizens. While some are limited by the technology they are able to afford, they can at least expect that they will not be further hindered by their ISPs. Net Neutrality is important for accessibility.

—Mr. Ronald Gelden, LONGMONT, CO

The ridiculousness of slow and fast lanes that are being proposed will only make it more difficult for the average citizen to be able to access the Internet and hinder educational opportunities as well as public services. The FCC fought to get the Internet accessible to those that would otherwise not see access, and public services improved--but with the threat of slow and fast lanes, all that will become defunct. It is critical to allow common access to an asset that was built 'by the people FOR the people' so many years ago and fosters free speech, innovation, collaboration and equality for all those using it whether pink, red, black, white, yellow or whatever corner of the globe they originate - as it has since its inception 50+ years ago. Please DO NOT be seduced (or bought) by big corporate interests Mr. Wheeler or you too will be complicit in the continued erosion of our society in favour of a very few controlling interests in essence 'raping' the resources of our planet with no real benefit to 'the people' these things were invented/designed for. Net Neutrality is important because if there is no neutrality on the internet, there will be no point in the internet what so ever if people have no freedom of expression, choice and other. Basically count on people dropping internet service with their own providers and joining communities who outsource internet services that ARE neutral which would be apart from the global internet. Yes, I would be one of those to outsource internet services to the public. If there is no neutrality there is no internet. IT's as simple as that. I will not be part of the problem, but instead part of the solution. Change it and guaranteed things will DRASTICALLY change in how people communicate. Why rely on the existing media monopolies to create the next Reddit, Google, Paypal, or Amazon, when they failed to create those companies on their own in the first place? Why spend more on limiting the options of individuals who have the next big idea, while putting those plans out of the financial reach of the 99.999% of the population who won't be able to ever afford to launch those plans? Why raise the amounts spent by the public, by the government, and by the companies already involved in the internet even higher, with regulation that is beyond what is already in place? The internet is the biggest free and infinite resource that everyone should have without paying? its electronic bits that are non-physical objects, logical in place its the dreamers world, incorporating capitalism on something that isn't real is the devils work!

Stop the big suppliers for taking advantage of the little consumers they straggle to pay the bills

—George Papaioannou, ,

You want to throttle innovation? Remove net neutrality. You want big companies to rule the world? Remove net neutrality. You want your kids ideas' to be shot down in future? Remove net neutrality. You want to make it difficult for normal people to bring up an urgent issue in a remote corner of the world? Remove net neutrality. You want all human beings to be born unequal? Remove net neutrality. You don't want apps like Angry Birds that creating a revolution of sorts in the mobile world? Remove net neutrality. You want the internet to become a restrictive society, where only things required by some people show up? Remove net neutrality. You don't want to do any of these? KEEP NET NEUTRALITY.

—ZeoMal, ,

It would be nice to have one neutral aspect of modern society.

—Craig Ryan Shisler, Dayton, OH

I have been told that some countries, which have achieved true net neutrality, have developed much more advanced internet (optic access for all) infrastructures. Not only would I like to see this kind of progress in my own country, but I am quite opposed to any form of cartel, oligopoly, or whatever word you would like to use to describe the system of North American ISPs. Even if I weren't an internet user at all, I would still be morally opposed to the kind of underhanded market manipulation these companies are involved in.

—Jeremy, ,

Please reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under title II to protect real net neutrality Thank you for your time

—Miriam feehily, ,

The internet is a place of innovation and should stay equal. There should never be a pay to win on innovation.

—Kelli Kathleen Blanton, Santaquin, UT

Because we payed for this with our taxes. To let a wealthy group of greedy un-american dictators rule over us any more would be moronic and beyond wrong. This is the peoples country, not Comcast-land.

—John L. Jones, Oak Lawn, IL

The internet should be open and free not just another cash cow to be ruined by profit milking corporations!

—Leigh Scott, ,

The one free source of global communication without borders, must remain free. No bullets or rockets or missiles are fired here and no one dies here, unless you kill it. Net Neutrality is the best form of freedom of speech and the global path to world peace !

—Roger Hass, ,

The internet should not be controlled by any agency or corporation - period.

—DreamBliss, Camas, WA

Because net neutrality is the underlying principle that made the internet a such an economic, scientific and social success.

—Nils Solanki, Lenox, MA

Since the court decision I've already noticed a substantial increase in buffering and websites failing to load in a timely matter. I wholeheartedly believe this is due to the large ISP's intentionally setting up bottlenecks on their networks and failing to enable the appropriate bandwidth and capacity in a effort to coerce large bandwidth users into paying additional fees to access their customers. This was not an issue at all prior to the court ruling. Please put a stop to this destructive behavior. Protect my freedom of speech! Reclassify the internet as a utility plain and simple and be done with it. Why are we even talking about tolls roads and preferential treatment? I support this cause and you should too! The internet provides for the largest and most diverse method communication in the history of the planet. Limiting its growth, capabilities, and potential will hurt freedom of speech and introduce numerous problems in the future. Please support a free and open internet for the sake of all humanity on this planet!

—Concerned Citizen, Mesa, AZ

Net Neutrality is a crucial part to the survival, and growth of the internet. An internet slow lane will prevent users who can't afford to pay the premium fees will be unable to satisfactorily use the internet and participate in the development of the human knowledge.

—David, ,

I use the internet to search for work and apply for jobs as a contract Engineer. I would not be able to use the internet as effectively, if there was a fee for using it. I need an open internet.

—Ethan Denniston, Mission, KS

I want to live in a society which is becoming more not less free

—Lawrence Upton, ,

We don't need an internet dominated by fat-cats with deep pockets! Keep it free and open to everyone!

—Glen Peters, Elgin,

"Don't destroy the internet!"

—Papa Luminata, ,

All you need is basic common sense and a little experience with companies like Comcast to know they will take ANY opportunity to screw over the little guy!!!

—Janette Wilson, Valparaiso, IN

To seek a Job, as most are now ONLY available via the Internet, And all the forms you have to fill out for a JOB are mostly only accessible via the Internet. Blatant Discrimination against those less fortunate can't be Legal surely!

—Vicki, ,

Fairness to all. The rich/corporations already have more than ample leverage through exploiting human insecurities with their propaganda/advertisements, via political donations and all manner of activities - they do NOT need unfair advantage in overriding small businesses and small voices, minority and even majority interests nor for buying the media. Keep the common carriage as is - it's the only way to keep the net a free source of information for all, and that's the only right and just thing to do. Thankyou.

—Olive Edwards, Beverly Hills, CA

The internet is the last bastion of free expression left on earth. It's a place where you can be yourself without fear. It's a place where everyone is inherently equal. There's a beauty to it that doesn't exist anywhere else - a beauty that most lawmakers don't understand because they're not part of the internet generation. It's a beauty that's going to get slowly eroded unless something's done to protect it.

—Joe Gibbs, San Anselmo, CA

The internet is not under a flag, it is a global right and should be viewed as a similar thing like the north or south pole, in other words, a place where no one can demand tolls and other fees for using it. America doesn't own the internet, the entire world owns it together, no nation or organization has the right to demand fees for that. If you truly value freedom, like every American I have heard about does, you will walk away from this proposal, erase it from your mind, and keep any similar thoughts under your breath, because we, the people of the world will not accept these things.

—Rune Joakim Brobakken, ,

You have more people on a lower pay scale, then higher and will not be able to afford the outrageous fees this change will impose on them, we need common carriers.

—Wanda Bankston, Stone Mountain, GA

Big corps shouldn't be able to buy the Internet!!!

—Constance Lorig, De Pere, WI

What about freedom?

—Simon Byrom, ,

Yet another great thing about to be destroyed for greed. No one owns the net. It was built by the people that big business is trying to get over on. Yes you will allow big business to get over on all of the Internet users. Don't do it!!!!!!

—Justin Holland, Chesterton, IN

The World Wide Web is about everyone, not the interests of corporations. Sorry you didn't invent it and populate it solely, so it's not yours to bully about.

—Steph Zannakis, ,

Inequality causes real harm. And we create inequality all too easily, scarcely noticing the opportunities we deny people who are different to us. Diversity enriches us all. We should ensure everyone has equal access to the infrastructure that's become essential to learning and communicating.

—Erik van Keulen, ,

The Internet enriches people's lives enormously. Let it be. Let the people be enriched with this amazing tool. I have used the Internet to stay in touch with friends, to make new friends, for emotional support, for crisis support, for education, entertainment. Free wifi in libraries with available computers is a vital tool any person can use. Let it be. The people need it.

—Melody Matthews, Pinehill, NM

Net neutrality is the foundation for innovation and creativity on the Internet. Having a common speed means that a teen from rural Oklahoma has the same opportunity to create and innovate as large corporations in the Silicon Valley. Considering that the most game-changing innovations on the Internet have come from the most unexpected places, creating a two-tier internet will reduce opportunities for creativity and innovation ultimately hurting the economy and will allow other nations to overtake America as the leader for internet innovations.

—Sarah Hasnain, ,

All data is the same, just 1 and 0's. All data should have equal speed rights on the internet

No fast lanes for some and slow lanes for others.

—Dwight Cain, ,

This is where the free press lives now. The major producers of "news" are captured by the interests of their parent organizations which rarely coincide with those of the nation the world or its people. Case in point: If New York is regularly flooded in 100 years it will be the fault of the "mainstream media" and its paymasters for distorting the scientific truth of man made climate change. This is supremely ironic given that this year shady Germany actually generated half of its required power from solar (while the US and China are locked into a race toward fossil fuel induced oblivion). The internet is currently the only outlet for accurate factual current information in an age literally defined by rampant cynical and poisonous propaganda.

—Robert Morgan, Austin, TX

Because we live in a free democratic society and have choice.

—Juan Carlos Hincapié, ,

I stand with the experts at Free Press who are fighting for Net Neutrality and believe that: Common carriage is one of the most successful policies in U.S. history. Abandoning it for Internet access has created an unworkable policy framework at the FCC and enabled Internet service providers to exploit their market power. Common carriage fosters innovation and investment. Reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers is the only way to keep them from blocking, slowing down and interfering with websites, apps and content they don't like. The FCC's current proposal would destroy Net Neutrality, and it's inconsistent with the intent of Congress. I urge you to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers under Title II to protect real Net Neutrality.

—Conrad Martin, Boulder, CO

The internet is our most powerful tool. Not just of communication, but humanity's most powerful tool - period. It is a force for good in the world - it spreads knowledge and help faster than sound, over almost all the earth. This legislation would break it. By removing its essential quality of total equality, it would remove our Most Powerful Tool and replace it with a thin, corporate mockery. I don't care what you think this legislation would achieve - it's not worth that. Almost nothing is worth that.

—David Ennever, , it allows the "little" people to have a voice as well.

—Danny Vaughan, ,

The internet is the most powerful tool humanity has at its disposal. Crippling the internet as we know it with your proposed bill will have serious degenerative effects on the lives and mental acuity of future generations. Please don't kill the internet.

—Ryan Bross, New Brighton, PA

—Joan O'Connor (Mrs. David Duffy), , internet belongs to anybody and not to phones companies, they have no rights at all to rules something which they just use it without have no right to change it and shape it at their pleasure, do not give the chance to big telecom have the power to rules something that does not belong to them but to anyone in the world. internet is as same as the air, nobody can choose to manage how much air we need and how we do have to inhale the air and so on. please respect this simple does make sense rules and thank you.

—Paolo Tofani, ,

Open and free internet gives voices to people who would not have otherwise been heard. Corporate control of information is an affront to all of humanity.

—Kyle Rausch, ,

We all have the right to enjoy net neutrality. We pay for our services and you do not have the right to decide which of those services we should or shouldn't have quick or reasonable access to. Leave the internet neutral, it is not a corporate owned item. Common carriage is the only successful and fair system that will truly work. Keep the internet open to the users who pay for it. Reclassify broadband providers as common carriers.

—Jill, ,

I have to have an efficient Internet in order to do my work!

—Sue Christiansen, Iowa City, IA

Freedom of speech is important as is universal access to information. It is against our principles as a country founded on the dream of equal opportunity to prevent people from having access to some websites as quickly as others. Attention spans are dwindling. There is a huge change in how long people are willing to wait around for anything (just look at our country's love of microwaves and fastfood). If there is a slow lane it will dramatically hurt small businesses, educational institutions, journalists, artists, etc. it will hurt profits and reduce so many people's ability to use their free speech to speak as loudly as large corporations who can pay the difference. There shouldn't be a difference. This is a moral issue. Please do the right thing and let people have equal access to publishing on the Internet. Thank you kindly for listening. I think this is a really important issue.

—Celeste Lupkes, Citrus Heights, CA

Not having to wonder who is watching as I surf is already an issue and the thought of government adding themselves to the mix is just as insulting as being hacked. Help us, don't hinder us by joining them., please!

—Edward Ignatov, ,

The Internet is one of the, if not the only, neutral place in the world. Keeping the Internet neutral in every possible way is incredibly important because it is the only truly global communication platform. No one person or group should have unbalanced control in or unbalanced access to something that profound. Equal opportunity to capacity and speed, while staying unbiased, is absolutely necessary to keep the Internet unique while keeping it well on its path of improvement and innovation.

—Rizwaan Qasim, ,

The net is now part of our commons. We should all have equal access. If some businesses need faster service for their customers let them build something for their needs.

—Victoria Wikle, Villa Grande, CA

My grandchildren are students and depend on the internet to find factual research materials for their education. Today's libraries are geared toward electronic files and the vast amount of knowledge available to students only online. My family all appreciate all types of books and printed reading material but not all is available in the local libraries, more commonly known as "media centers" because the nature of information has changed drastically since I was a kid in a small town borrowing books from the bookmobile. We MUST guarantee that our children have access to all learning materials available. Please consider this in addition to the online shopping which saves folks in small towns and rural areas a great deal of time and money. Social media is nice but I don't care if we need to revert to snail mail, which would be a major boost to the post office. Please give great consideration to the individuals who need the internet to be open to all and not just those with money left over after food and shelter have been paid for.

—W C., Louisville, KY

I will NOT have some company(s) with an agenda deciding where I can go, what I can learn, what I can say, where I can buy... and the list goes on. If those things were happening in the "real" world (what you do on the Internet is real - real people, real products, etc), then this would be the exact OPPOSITE of a free country!

—, Payson, AZ

The internet gives every single person on the earth an opportunity to have a voice, regardless of class, race, sex or status. By taking away the democracy of the internet you will effectively stomp out the voices and free flow of information and ideas from millions of people.

These are utility companies and should be regulated as such.

—R Clements, Anytown, TX

Development of a free web determines its growth and attracts everyone. This does not need regulation, particularly as it is a totally destructive basis for any such service, anywhere in the world.

—Cheryl Ede, San Diego, CA

This change would make for a smaller, meaner, less open world. This regressive step should never be taken.

—Jon Humble, ,

Without reasonably accessible internet, how is the world supposed to progress and develop? News, social media, art, music, etc... are all things that rely on free access to internet - they are also things that allow for contemporary culture to flourish and thrive through free connectivity. The internet itself is a giant hub for global change. If taken away, a monopoly involving what gets to be seen, who gets to communicate, how effectively positive change can occur is put in place - our freedom to grow is affected drastically. We cannot put trust [even in the case of the internet] in those with great amounts of money. If money were a factor to be considered, how and why is it these large entities are not using it for better things? The world needs great amounts of help. If their intentions were good, we would see by their fruits. Where are their hearts?

Access to the internet is virtually necessary today, and losing connection speed can hamstring small businesses, the exchange of information, and online collaboration. Creating an oligopoly on something as important as high speed Internet access is a disastrous economic decision.
—Alexander Eddy, ,

I want access to all information when I want it.
—Rocky Boss, Seattle, WA

Ending net neutrality would defeat the whole purpose of a world wide data and information sharing service and restrict the flow of knowledge. By making the web a premium service it is disallowing people from seeking what they might be looking for because they're website didn't want to pay an absurd and immoral "tax" of sorts for what should be a free service. When I went to my local library I used the Internet in order to research school projects and to broaden my horizon of learning. Do not allow big telecom to shut down the flow of free knowledge and data for something as arbitrary as profit, because once you turn off the faucet the pressure will build until it destroys itself.
—Patrick Smith, ,

Is the FCC there for average person or for large telecom corporations? There are far more average people than telecom corporations. Make sure your choice is for the right reasons...
—Gary Revoy, ,

I already pay for a lackluster contract where minimum speeds are never guaranteed, but I made a choice to stay with a small company to avoid these special-interest monopolies. Yet I would be forced to pay THEM for service I have with another provider just because they would own the majority of networks. I already pay for my Netflix subscription, but I would have to pay more to cover their costs because they would suddenly find themselves in a position of having to purchase a 'fast track'. My friends who own small businesses (who are already struggling in the age of unchecked corporate greed) will loose the last vestige of battle as they would be charged on the same scale as large corporations because they are businesses. If Chairman Wheeler refuses to serve and represent the American people who employ him, he can quit or be fired and go back to working for his big telecom greedy pigs.
—Ril'riia Kil'urden, Lewiston, ME

A fast lane really just makes more slow lanes.

Net Neutrality is important to me because although I am interested in large sites like Youtube and Google, I am also interested in lesser known sites like bogleech.com, various webcomics (by hobbyists and professionals), and work in an internship via the internet with an internet-based manga translation company. I don't want some of my connections slow and some fast just because site owners didn't pay enough, or because they aren't a main stream site, or because an internet company executive didn't like what was on them. This isn't about finding ways to charge for higher service; this is about access to the world-wide exchange of ideas, communication, and business; biasing or retarding that gateway by money or principle is detrimental to the web's growth and jeopardizes its service to humanity.

—J Willis, Lake Oswego, OR

Both, server operators and Internet users, pay already for the traffic they cause. There is no point for the introduction of slow and paid fast lanes within the Internet.

—MEng René Schwarz, ,

Re: GN Docket No. 14-28, Protecting and Promoting the Open Internet
GN Docket No. 10-127, Framework for Broadband Internet Service

Dear Ms. Dortch,

Enclosed please find the signatures and comments of 60,269 people urging the Federal Communications Commission to protect real Net Neutrality.

Since the FCC's proposed rules were announced we have seen a groundswell of public opposition to that proposal. We call on the FCC to abandon any unworkable rules based on compromised legal theories, and instead reclassify ISPs as common carriers.
